St. Albans Senior Center Pimp Convicted in Queens Court

A Queens judge is expected to sentence a St. Albans predator to up to eight years in prison for admitting that he took advantage of a drug-addicted senior citizen and pimped a teenage girl, prosecutors said.

Joseph Gilbert pleaded guilty before Queens Supreme Court Justice Peter Vallone Jr. on Thursday for attempting to sex traffick a 16-year-old girl from December 2016 to March 2017.

"The youngster suffered greatly, but managed to escape the clutches of the defendant. She will, however, have to live with the memory of this experience for the rest of her life," said Queens District Attorney Richard A. Brown in a statement Friday.

Gilbert, 26, coerced the girl to move into an apartment inside a Jamaica senior residence, where he and another drug-addicted senior citizen lived. Within the apartment, Gilbert forced the teen to have sex dates with strangers and to turn over all the money she made, prosecutors said.

When the girl had enough of engaging in prostitution and requested to leave, Gilbert viciously beat and threatened her.

Gilbert is expected to get sentenced to four to eight years in prison on Jan. 25.

SENTENCING DAY FOR BANKER BUSTED FOR STEALING $650K

Joshua Stephens-Anselm pleaded guilty to second-degree grand larceny for stealing $650,000 from estates. He appears in TAP A for sentencing.

Prosecutors say the Far Rockaway resident, 29, stole money from two elderly sisters' accounts to fund his vacations and shopping sprees. Stephens-Anselm worked at JP Morgan Chase.

Stephens-Anselm began to write checks to himself from the victims' accounts before they died in 2013 and 2014. He then downloaded an app and made electronic payments from their accounts to his, prosecutors said.

"This trusted bank employee took advantage of his access to enrich himself," said Queens District Attorney Richard A. Brown in a statement. "Using the accounts as if they were his own personal piggy banks, the defendant is alleged to have not only paid his living expenses, but also spent the money on luxuries like hotels and vacations and partying at hookah bars. If the allegations are proven true, the defendant will face a long term of incarceration as a result of his greed."

De Blasio Hurriedly Announces Limited, Late Rollout for Half-Priced MetroCards

Announcement Comes After Prodding by Advocates

By Mary Frost
BQ Daily Eagle

On Friday Mayor Bill de Blasio and City Council Speaker Corey Johnson belatedly announced details of a half-priced MetroCard program for low-income New Yorkers.

This comes after an intensifying volume of criticism from transit advocates and Comptroller Scott Stringer, who called the mayor's rollout of the program late, disorganized and lacking clarity. Half-priced cards were originally scheduled to be available on Jan. 1.

According to a release from the Mayor's Office, the half-priced cards will at first only be available to a fraction of working residents at or below the federal poverty level who are receiving cash assistance or food stamps (now known as SNAP) from the city's Department of Social Services. The city said it is committed to expanding the program to as many New Yorkers as possible in the future.

The Department of Social Services began to contact the first batch of 30,000 eligible individuals on Friday, according to the release. The city expects to add roughly 130,000 people to the program in April.

Participants will initially be able to purchase only unlimited weekly and monthly passes at MTA vending machines. The city says it is "working with the MTA" to phase in a pay-per-ride option, which it expects to launch in April.

Stringer, Advocates Light a Fire Under Mayor

On Thursday, in advance of the mayor's announcement, city Comptroller Scott Stringer had joined Riders Alliance and Community Service Society to push the mayor to release details about the program.

"It did not start on time. No one knows how to apply. It is unclear who will qualify or even which subway and bus passes will be offered at half-price," Stringer said.

Some 800,000 low-income New Yorkers live below the poverty line and were promised access to the cards, Stringer pointed out — far greater than the 30,000 participating in the delayed rollout. Of these, 33 percent live in Brooklyn and 58 percent are female.

On Friday, Stringer said in a statement, "The good news is that Fair Fares is finally leaving the station. The bad news is that after today's announcement, the price of a MetroCard will remain an obstacle for the vast majority of the 800,000 New Yorkers who were originally promised relief. That's hundreds of thousands of families who will still struggle to get to work or a job interview because they can't afford a full fare."

Advocates also warned that making available a pay-per-ride option was of paramount importance because many low-income riders do not "have the means to pay even the half-priced $16 per week or $60.50 per month all at once, up-front."

An MTA survey showed that households earning less than $50,000 purchased 66 percent of all single-ride tickets and just 39 percent of 30-Day Passes.

At Friday's presser, Council Speaker Corey Johnson gave credit to the mayor and elected officials, but mostly to advocates like Community Service Society and the Riders Alliance.

Councilmember Stephen Levin (D-Greenpoint, Brooklyn Heights), the Council's General Welfare chair, said he was committed to "ensuring the Department of Social Services has the tools they need to successfully implement this program citywide."

Full-priced MetroCard fare is $2.75, making a half-priced ride $1.35.

The city will be providing $106 million for the Fair Fares NYC program in the first year. The poverty line is defined as $25,100 for a family of four.

Malliotakis Laments Low Number of House GOP Women

By Paula Katinas
BQ Daily Eagle

Republican state Assemblymember Nicole Malliotakis watched the television coverage of the new members being sworn into office in the 116th Congress with mixed emotions. While she was proud to see so many women elected to the House, she lamented the fact that so few of them are members of her party.

Malliotakis expressed her concerns on Twitter, posting a tweet in which she pointed out the dismal number of Republican women.

"A record # of women will be sworn into 116th Congress today but ONLY 21 out of 127 are Republican," Malliotakis tweeted on Thursday, the first day the new Congress was in session. "Only 4 out of 42 newly elected women & 5 out of 55 new Republicans. A sad commentary on either my party's ability to attract women or willingness to run qualified women or both."

The numbers "are staggering," Malliotakis told the Eagle.

Malliotakis, 38, was re-elected in November to her fifth term in the state Assembly representing the 64th Assembly District, which covers parts of Bay Ridge and Staten Island. She raised her political profile in 2017 when she ran against Democrat Bill de Blasio for mayor. She lost that race, but her candidacy created a great deal of buzz in New York City politics.

She is full of ideas on how her party can increase its numbers among women.

The Republican Party could attract more women if it concentrated on honing its message, Malliotakis said. "We should be speaking to people about kitchen-table issues like lowering taxes, creating jobs, improving the economy and education," she said.

Malliotakis added that GOP leaders should be actively recruiting more women to run for office and fully support them when they do.

"I've never played identity politics in my political career, whether it's running for the Assembly, or when I ran for mayor. I've never said 'Vote for me because I'm a woman.' But when we have quality women running for office, we should be looking to support them," she said.

It's important that the GOP do better with women so that "there is a counter-balance to what Alexandria Ocasio-Cortez is saying," she said, referring to the left-leaning new congressmember from Queens who is fast becoming a superstar in the Democratic Party.

Republicans need to fight against stereotypes that have been placed upon the GOP by Democrats, she said. "Democrats have used fear-mongering, and it has proven to be a successful strategy for them. We should do a better job of explaining our positions on issues," she said.

Malliotakis offered the immigration fight as an example.

"There is a big difference between legal immigration and illegal immigration. But the left has been successful in convincing people that Republicans are looking to round up legal immigrants and deport them out of the country," she said.

The current number of GOP female office holders is depressing, but there is reason to hope, Malliotakis said.

Leaders like Nikki Haley, the former U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, can serve as role models, Malliotakis said.

"Nikki Haley is a clear rising star in our party who embodies the direction we need to take going forward. As a fellow minority woman from an immigrant family, I find her particularly relatable," said Malliotakis, who is half-Greek and half-Hispanic.

There are also positive signs on the local level, she said, pointing to Queens and Manhattan as examples.

"Queens in particular benefits from the strong leadership of a female GOP Chair, Joann Ariola. Joann joins Manhattan GOP's Andrea Catsimatidis in leading New York City's Republicans and brings years of dedicated experience, political acumen and a female perspective to the table," Malliotakis said.

Malliotakis had not held office before she ran for the Assembly in 2010, defeating a two-term Democratic incumbent.

She recalled being a fifth grader and being inspired by Republican Susan Molinari, who served in Congress from 1990 to 1997 representing Staten Island and Southwest Brooklyn.

Molinari came to Malliotakis' school to speak to students. "She was very impressive. I didn't decide to go into politics right there and then. But she made a big impression on me," Malliotakis said.

Malliotakis said her mother Vera inspired her decision to join the Republican Party. Vera Malliotakis had fled Cuba many years earlier and often talked to her daughter about the dangers of Communism and governmental overreach. The younger Malliotakis believed that the Republican Party did a good job of speaking out against Communism and promoting a can-do spirit.

The Republican Party could attract more women to its side if it concentrated on honing its message, according to Assemblymember Nicole Malliotakis. Eagle file photo by Paula Katinas

Many Hate Crimes Never Make It Into The FBI's Database

By Sophie Bjork-James
The Conversation

The FBI's latest numbers showed a 17 percent increase in reported hate crimes in 2017.

But what does this actually say about the actual number of hate crimes occurring in the U.S.?

Not much.

The Hate Crime Statistics Act of 1990 mandates that the FBI publish statistics specifically for crimes motivated by bias, and a broad network of state laws require that hate crimes are both tracked and prosecuted. Despite this, a variety of problems plague the implementation of these laws.

A total of 16,149 law enforcement agencies reported 7,175 incidents of hate crimes to the FBI in 2017. That means that 87.4 percent of law enforcement agencies reported zero bias-motivated crimes.

On the surface, this number seems suspiciously low, particularly when considering that the other federal survey of hate crimes, the National Crime Victimization Survey, which looks at how many people say they've experienced a hate crime, estimates that "U.S. residents experienced an average of 250,000 hate crime victimizations each year from 2004 to 2015." There remains an enormous discrepancy between what victims report as a hate crime and what law enforcement agencies do.

The FBI numbers appear even more suspicious in light of the fact that, as the Arab American Institute points out, several high-profile hate crimes are not in the data. For example, Kansas reported no hate crimes for 2017, despite the murder of Indian immigrant Srinivas Kuchibhotla. Adam Purinton reportedly yelled, "Get out of my country," before shooting and killing Kuchibhotla and wounding two others in an Olathe, Kansas bar. Purinton was caught hours later in Missouri after telling a bartender at an Applebee's that he'd shot two "Iranians" and needed a place to hide.

Why Are Hate Crimes Underreported?

Since 2016, the investigative journalism organization ProPublica has created a national network of news organizations to document hate crimes. The Documenting Hate Project recognizes that "There is simply no reliable national data on hate crimes."

Journalist Rachel Glickhouse, who helped found Documenting Hate, told me that the FBI data are useful in showing broad patterns around hate crimes occurrences, but there are a variety of reasons why their numbers are likely incomplete.

One problem she noted was that many police departments provide either zero or cursory training around hate crimes. In some cases, state officials were even misinformed about relevant statutes in their states. Different departments also track hate crimes differently, making it challenging to easily find data.

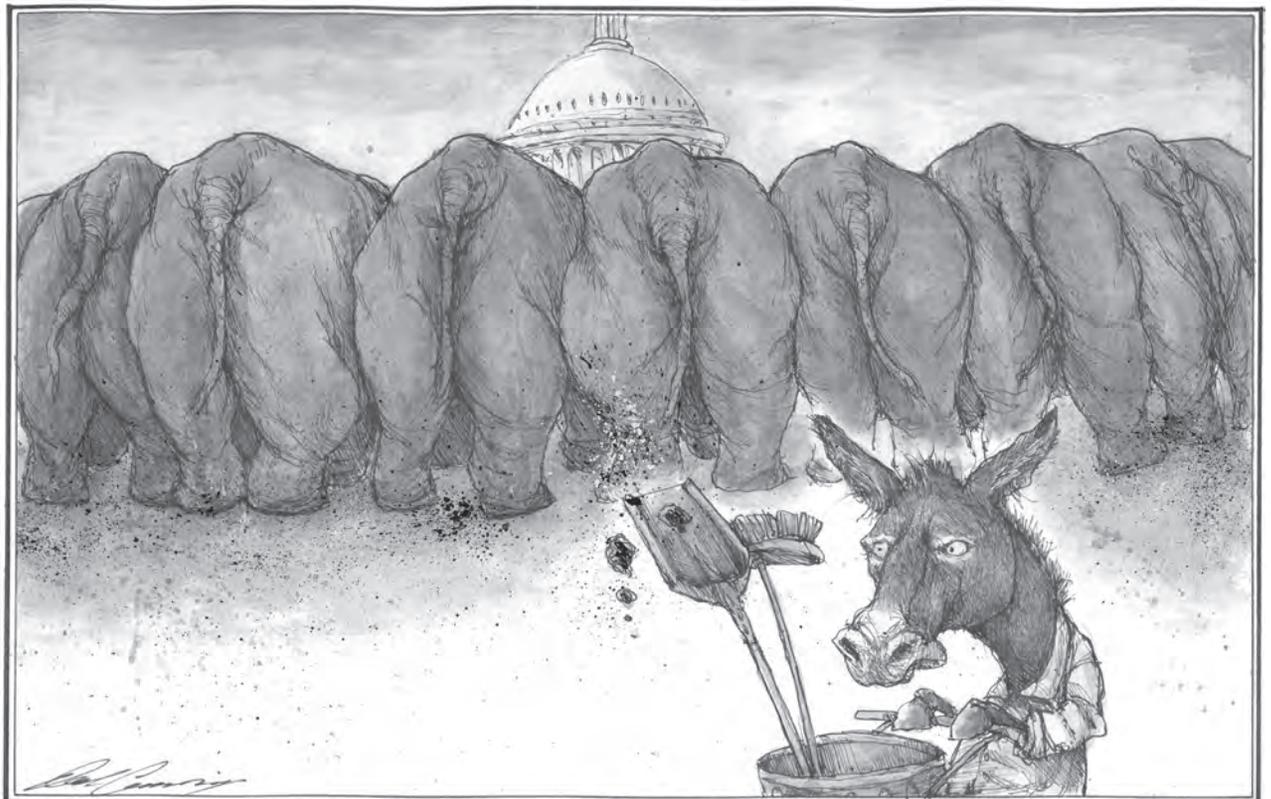

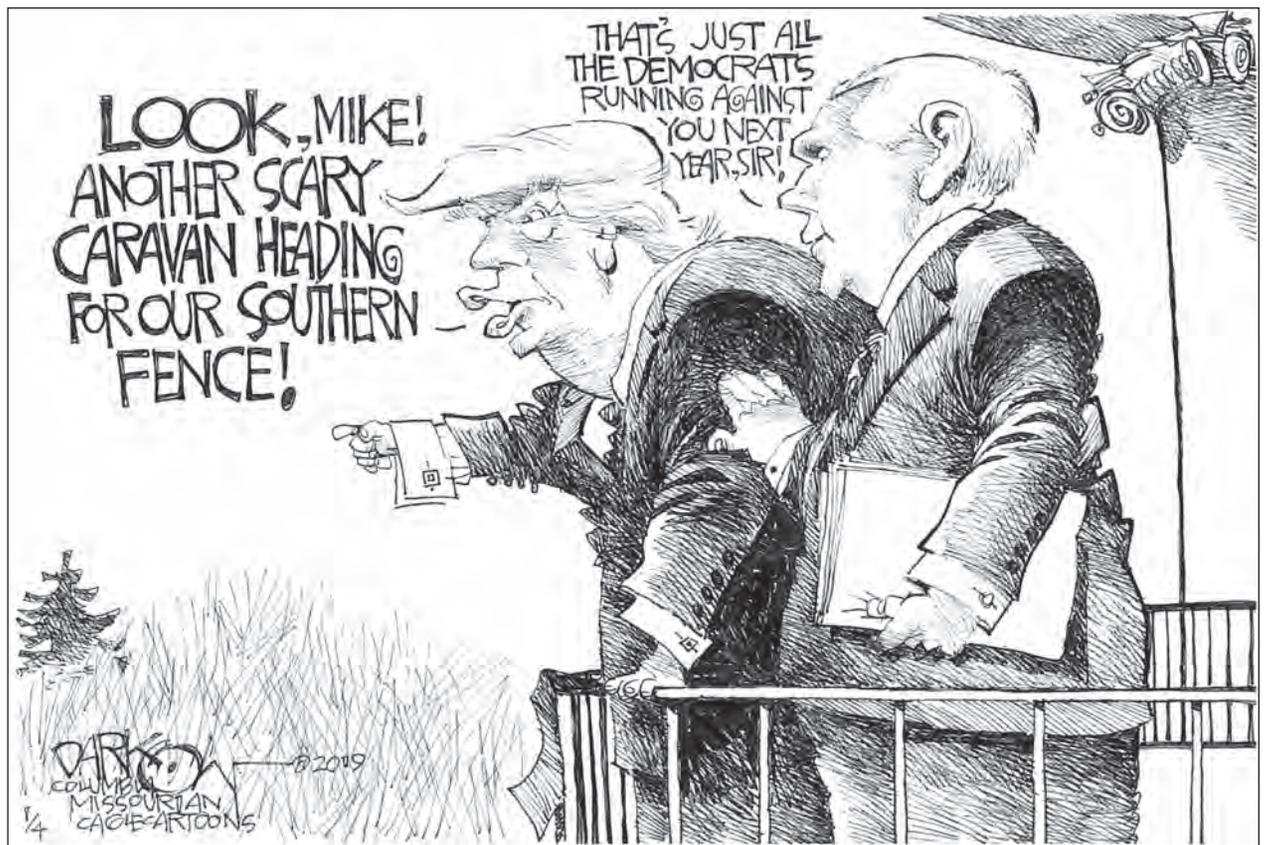

Buzzfeed reporters looked at over 2,400 police incident reports from 10 of the largest police departments that reported no hate crime incidents for 2016. The investigation identified "15 assaults in which the cops' own narratives suggested that the suspect may have been motivated by bias."

Lack of trust between law enforcement and communities that have been historically targeted by hate also leads to underreporting, says Arusha Gordon, counsel for the Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights' Stop Hate Project, an organization that trains law enforcement and prosecutors on responding to hate crimes.

It's important to work on "building trust between law enforcement and communities that have been historically targeted by hate." For example, immigrant and LGBT communities "might not feel comfortable reporting to police because of their citizenship status or because they might have had a previously negative interaction with someone in law enforcement."

Gordon stressed how important it is to also train law enforcement to recognize "indicators of hate." For instance, the number 88 is a key symbol in the contemporary white nationalist movement. (The letter "H" is the eighth letter of the alphabet, so 88 stands for "Heil Hitler.") If a property crime includes an 88 spray-painted on a building, the police officer might not understand the crime's connection to a hate movement.

Former FBI and Homeland Security employees have said that law enforcement doesn't pay enough attention to racist groups or downplays hate crimes incidents to victims. For example, in December, New York City's deputy human rights commissioner experienced a racist incident, but city police officers discouraged her from reporting it — an incident that's part of a broader trend of undercounting hate crimes in New York.

Domestic Terrorism

Having studied the white supremacist movement in the U.S, I see the problems associated with the FBI's hate crimes reporting as part of a larger issue related to FBI priorities around fighting terrorism.

Threats by far-right groups aren't addressed with the same resources, even while they motivate a variety of bias-motivated crimes. In fact, there are no longer any Homeland Security officials dedicated to monitoring right-wing extremism.

In 2009, years before Charlottesville and a string of high-profile white supremacist murders, Daryl Johnson — then an analyst for the Department of Homeland Security — authored a report outlining the threats posed by "Rightwing Extremism." In hindsight, the analysis predicted much of what has come to pass: a rise in hate crimes and domestic terrorism carried out by white supremacist and far-right groups, many of them former veterans.

However, a broad political backlash from conservative media and veterans groups forced the Department of Homeland Security to rescind the report. Johnson's team was disbanded the following year.

Former FBI special agent Michael German, who worked undercover to infiltrate right-wing extremist groups before leaving the FBI in 2004, told me that law enforcement might be failing to see hate crimes as possibly part of a broader pattern. For example, if a skinhead group is engaging in organized crime, law enforcement may not see the connections between individual violent acts and never investigate the broader organization.

There are additionally a number of examples of situations when the FBI did not label criminal acts as domestic terrorism, even when the crimes fit the statutory definition. Although far-right violence does not always qualify as terrorism, it does count when it is done in an effort to change the broader political discourse.

Studies show that far-right extremists have caused more deaths than Islamist extremists since 9/11. The most comprehensive database on far-right violence in the U.S. tracked 4,420 violent incidents carried out by far-right actors between 1990 and 2012, including 670 deaths and over 3,000 individuals injured.

In a statement on the 2017 hate crimes report, the FBI said that it is "working with law enforcement partners across the country to encourage reporting of hate crime statistics." They promise that, in 2019, they will provide training for law enforcement officers in how to identify and report bias-motivated incidents. I feel that this is an important step in working to fix the problems in the U.S. with reporting and prosecuting hate crimes.

Meet the Twitter-User Behind Viral Ocasio-Cortez Dance Account

By Christina Carrega
BQ Daily Eagle

A now-defunct anonymous Twitter account's attempt to smear U.S. Rep. Alexandria Ocasio-Cortez for a video that shows her dancing on a rooftop with her college friends has inspired an Arizona teenager to create her own account dedicated to the newly sworn-in Democrat.

"I went to bed with 2,500 followers, woke up at 6 to 8,300 followers, and now I have over 9,300," said Valentina, the woman behind @aoc_dances, the viral Twitter account dedicated to dubbing over clips of the congresswoman dancing with a seemingly endless playlist of songs.

As of the time this article was published, that number had risen to 13,500 — and rapidly growing.

Valentina told the Eagle that she saw a tweet on Thursday linking to a video of Ocasio-Cortez as a college student at Boston University, performing The Breakfast Club dance scene choreography to the 2009 Phoenix song "Lisztomania." The text accompanying the video called the Democrat a "know-it-all" and a "clueless nitwit."

"If the worst thing you can pull out on a candidate is that she's a dancer — over the Republicans, who are accused of sexual harassment, racism and promoting policies that kill people — then her dancing... it's not bad," Valentina told the Eagle in a phone interview.

The username of the now-disappeared Twitter account that posted the original video on Thursday, @AnonymousQ1776, suggests a connection to the far-right conspiracy theory group QAnon.

In response to the original insulting tweet, Ocasio-Cortez posted an 11-second video of herself dancing outside her new office in Washington, D.C., on Friday.

"I hear the GOP thinks women dancing are scandalous. Wait till they find out Congresswomen dance too! [Dancing emoji] Have a great weekend everyone :)," she wrote.

Ocasio-Cortez, 29, is the youngest woman elected to serve in Congress and represents portions of the Bronx and Queens.

"I kept close tabs on her campaign, and if I lived in New York I would have campaigned for her. I'd definitely knock on doors for a Democratic Socialist," said Valentina.

Far away from Ocasio-Cortez's district, Valentina took the opportunity to show her support for the congresswoman by turning the bad joke into an appreciative one: @aoc_dances.

So far, Valentina has created 30-second videos of Ocasio-Cortez dancing to songs like ABBA's "Dancing Queen," Lorde's "Green Light" and M.I.A.'s "Paper Planes," as well as a special dedication to this newspaper: Steve Miller Band's "Fly Like An Eagle."

The requests from her followers keep rolling in.

A request for comment from Ocasio-Cortez was not immediately answered.

Woodside Man Charged With Fatal Punch Faces Court On Victim's Birthday

here to make sure my nephew has representation.”

Murphy, a Maspeth resident, was joined by his wife Denise and about ten of McGee's friends and colleagues, including his boss at the bar he worked at before his death. Murphy's mother, father and sisters live in Ireland, Murphy said.

“Christmas was very difficult. Thanksgiving was very difficult,” Murphy said. “And it will be for the rest of our lives.”

“I want this man to be punished as much as he can,” Murphy continued. “He killed somebody.”

The case has generated significant media attention in O'Brien and McGee's native

Ireland and a reporter from an Irish television station also spoke with Murphy inside the courthouse hallway.

O'Brien, 25, dressed in a crisp blue suit with a white shirt and purple pocket square, arrived at the courthouse shortly before 9 a.m. for his appearance before Judge Scott Dunn. He sat in the front row with four family members before his case was adjourned until Feb. 21.

His attorney, Matthew Gartenberg, said the district attorney's office was not yet ready for trial and had not made an offer for a plea deal to O'Brien, who was released on $25,000 bond.

“Mr. O'Brien is presumed innocent and we're going to keep fighting the charges,” Gartenberg said.

Jackson Heights Animal Hoarder Returns to Court

By David Brand
Queens Daily Eagle

Elizabeth Grant is charged with attempted assault on a peace or police officer for allegedly pushing a parole officer and violating a court-ordered ban against owning pets. Grant appears in TAP A for Supreme Court Arraignment.

Grant, a resident of Jackson Heights was caught housing 67 sick and neglected animals, including 55 cats, inside a home filled with urine and feces, Jackson Heights Patch reported in 2016. She was convicted for animal cruelty earlier this year.

Grant avoided jail time for animal abuse when a judge demanded she seek counseling and steer clear of pets for at least 10 years.

Last month, however, Grant allegedly assaulted a probation officer who stopped by her home and found even more mistreated animals.

“You can't come in here, you don't have a warrant, my case is on appeal, You can't do this to me,” Grant reportedly shouted. She also directed racist slurs at the probation officer.

The probation officer took pictures as evidence. When the officer was leaving, Grant allegedly attempted to push her down the stairs.

The incident led to a raid of the home, where police found seven dogs, one cat, two guinea pigs, two rabbits, two turtles, and two betta fish — all of which were allegedly mistreated.

Grant faces up to seven years in prison. She is being held on $100,000 bail.

On Thursday, Grant's case was adjourned until today because she got a new lawyer, Wyatt Gibbons.

Queens Rhodes Scholar And 'Dreamer' Fears He Cannot Return to U.S.

By Philip Marcelo
Associated Press

He became the first "Dreamer" to win the prestigious Rhodes scholarship, but for recent Harvard University graduate Jin Park, the joy of that achievement has given way to uncertainty.

The 22-year-old, who lives in Queens, risks not being allowed back in the country if he enrolls at the University of Oxford in England in the fall.

President Donald Trump's administration rescinded the option for overseas travel for those with Deferred Action for Childhood Arrivals status, or DACA, when he moved to phase out the Obama-era program in 2017.

But travel abroad, which was allowed under limited circumstances such as academic study during the Obama administration, should still be permitted because the federal courts have upheld the program for now, argue Park and his supporters.

"If I leave, there's a very real possibility that I won't be able to come back. That's the biggest fear for sure," said Park, whose family came to the U.S. from South Korea when he was 7 years old. "I haven't really thought about what that's going to mean if I'm not allowed back."

U.S. Citizen and Immigration Services, which administers DACA, didn't respond to emails seeking comment.

DACA recipients, commonly called "Dreamers" because of never-passed proposals in Congress called the DREAM Act, are protected from deportation because they were brought into the country illegally at a young age.

Discussing the risks has been a delicate topic to broach with his parents, who cried out of joy when he won the scholarship, Park said.

"I've been avoiding that question," he said days after graduating from Harvard last month. "This was especially meaningful for them. It was like a validation of the sacrifices they've made for me."

Nearly 700,000 individuals are currently on DACA, which was created in 2012 and can be renewed every two years. To qualify, immigrants must have entered the country by 2007 and been under age 16 when they arrived.

The Trump administration issued an order winding down the program in 2017, but federal judges in New York, California and Washington, D.C., ruled against those efforts last year and have effectively kept the program running.

The administration, which is now seeking a Supreme Court review of those rulings, said last February it would honor travel requests approved before it moved to end DACA, but is also warned recipients that going abroad without so-called "advance parole" approval "automatically terminates your deferred action under DACA."

Past Rhodes scholars and other Rhodes Trust supporters are volunteering their private counsel to Park in the meantime, but it's a "matter of American law and not anything the Rhodes Trust can resolve alone," said Elliot Gerson, the British organization's American secretary. "Our hope is for federal action," he added.

"The government should enforce the law as it currently stands, to allow Jin to fulfil his scholarly work," said Kristian Ramos, a spokesman for Define American, an immigrant advocacy organization that supported Park in his Rhodes scholarship bid.

Park could turn down the scholarship but has decided against that route. He wants to continue to be a voice in the immigration debate and believes the benefits of going to Oxford outweigh the risks.

"I'm looking forward to having that unstructured time to think about these broader questions of who belongs in America and the value judgments we make about others," he said.

Park has been a vocal advocate for DACA recipients since he was in high school. In 2015, he Park, who is an undocumented student, participates in the Deferred Action for Childhood Arrivals program (DACA), and said he is not sure if he'll be allowed back in the U.S. after his studies in the United Kingdom.

founded Higher Dreams, a nonprofit organization that helps students without permanent immigration status navigate the college application process.

With the backing of Harvard, Park applied for the Rhodes scholarship last year as part of a broader effort to underscore how DACA recipients didn't qualify for the venerated award and others like it. The scholarship was created in 1902 by British businessmen and politician Cecil Rhodes and provides all expenses for at least two years of study at Oxford.

Park's application — like a number of others in recent years — was rejected, but the message was received. The Rhodes organization changed its policy effective this year. Park re-applied and was accepted.

Gerson said the change reflects the organization's efforts to expand eligibility.

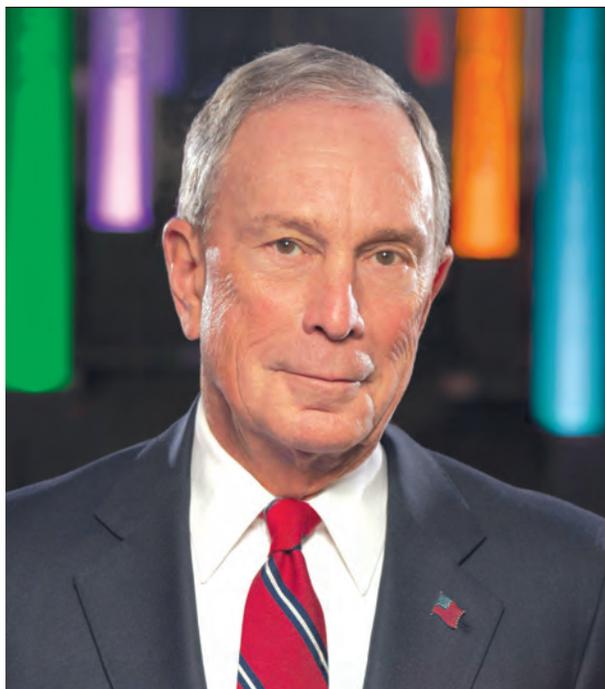

Legal permanent residents and residents of U.S. territories like Puerto Rico have also been allowed to apply in recent years.

At Oxford, Park hopes to study migration and political theory as he weighs his future.

The molecular and cell biology major has also applied to medical school, but he hasn't ruled out working in city government, where he believes he can make an impact on immigration policy "no matter who is in the White House."

And regardless what happens next, Park has the conviction of knowing where home is.

"For me, I think of Queens, New York," he said. "Whatever happens, I'm always going to know that fact. Even if I have to spend the rest of my life convincing the administration, or whoever comes next."

Bloomberg Gives Millions to Help St. Pete Reduce Emissions

The Associated Press

Former New York City Mayor Michael Bloomberg's foundation is giving a Florida city $2.5 million to aid its efforts to fight climate change.

Bloomberg announced Thursday that St. Petersburg, Florida is the 20th U.S. city to be selected as part of Bloomberg's American Cities Climate Challenge initiative.

The $70 million initiative invites cities into a two-year program that provides resources to help them reduce carbon emissions.

The Bloomberg foundation also said Thursday it was increasing the number of participant cities to 25 from 20 communities.

St. Petersburg officials say they will use the assistance to implement a utility community solar program and expand its residential solar co-op program, among other projects.

Queens DA Candidates Diverge on 'Over-Policing'

By David Brand
Queens Daily Eagle

In Queens Criminal Court, most of the judges, the prosecutors and the defense attorneys are white. District Attorney Richard A. Brown is white. So are the three candidates vying to replace him — Borough President Melinda Katz, Councilmember Rory Lancman and retired Judge Gregory Lasak.

The vast majority of defendants are not.

On July 31, for example, the watchdog Police Reform Organizing Project (PROP) monitored arraignments at Queens County Criminal Court and reported that 25 of 27 defendants — more than 92 percent — were people of color.

PROP's court watchers routinely report that rates of defendants of color exceed 90 percent in Queens and across the city. Yet, white residents account for nearly half of the overall population of the Queens.

Criminal justice reformers blame the racial disparities among defendants, in part, on over-policing — a popular term about where and why police departments focus their enforcement activity. The next Queens DA will have a major role to play in influencing police priorities, advocates say.

"Over-policing is based on the concept of 'broken windows,' the premise that if you deploy officers in areas where the most crimes committed, they will prevent more crimes." said Legal Aid staff attorney Anthony Posada.

"But if you send more officers with a directive to produce more arrests, produce more summonses, they will," Posada continued. "And then you're left with a 'tale of two cities,' where crimes occur but they aren't criminalized in white and wealthy communities" like they are in low-income communities of color.

Black and Latino New Yorkers account for a disproportionate number of virtually all low-level offenses, including fare evasion and marijuana possession.

In the case of misdemeanor criminal mischief, black New Yorkers account for 40.4 percent of all arrests while Hispanic New Yorkers account for 34 percent, according to the NYPD's 2017 year-end enforcement report. Black New Yorkers make up less than 25 percent of the city's population while Hispanic New Yorkers make up about 29 percent of the city's total population, according to the 2017 U.S. Census American Community Survey.

Posada said prosecutors can help shift policing priorities and address those disparities with their prosecution decisions.

"The role of prosecutors is huge because they are the gatekeepers of what to charge and how to charge," Posada said, adding that since arrests are concentrated "in a handful of communities, prosecutors are in a position to disrupt that pattern or examine that pattern ... But when none of that happens they're fueling the mass criminal state that we're in."

Over-policing also explicitly affects the political power and influence of entire communities, experts say.

A 2010 paper by political scientists Vesla Weaver and Amy Lerman — cited in a November City Limits "CityViews" op-ed — reports that seven community districts in New York City accounted for roughly three-quarters of the entire state's prison population. The neighborhoods include South Jamaica along with the Lower East Side, the South Bronx, Harlem, Brownsville, Bedford-Stuyvesant and East New York.

Those same neighborhoods also had some of the lowest voter turnout rates in the city, in part because people who are removed from the community and put in jail or who are on parole cannot vote, the authors of the op-ed said.

For several years, advocates like Shaun King, the

A line of NYPD cars.

New York Civil Liberties Union, Queens Neighborhoods United and various Queens council members like Daniel Dromm and Francisco Moya have called for police reforms related to enforcement of low-level offenses.

"How is it that whites use and sell marijuana at similar rates to blacks and Latinos but nine out of 10 people arrested for marijuana possession are black or brown?" Council Member Francisco Moya told the Eagle in response to a report on the vast racial disparities in marijuana arrests. "Because marijuana policies are selectively enforced — which is to say, because of an unjust system that criminalizes people of color for the same behavior that white people commit with relative impunity."

Considering the emphasis on criminal justice reform among Queens community groups and leaders, the Eagle asked each current DA candidate what they think of the term over-policing and how they would influence arrest disparities in communities of color.

Katz did not provide comment, but her campaign team referred questions to "over-policing" to her policy book which they said "outlines some of the positions she has taken to address racial disparities in arrests and indictments."

In terms of influencing enforcement priorities, Katz specifically said she will end prosecution of low-level marijuana arrests, something the current Queens DA Richard A. Brown has refused to do, even as his peers in Manhattan and Brooklyn have stopped prosecuting most marijuana offenses. Under the sub-heading, "Making the DA a partner for justice," Katz summarizes her general philosophy.

"Safety doesn't come from a jail cell, it comes from partnering with the community to reduce crime before it happens," the policy book reads. "It comes from addressing the real issues of police-community conflict and opening lines of communication to make crime reduction everyone's responsibility."

Lasak did not explicitly mention the term "over-policing" or refer to communities of color in a response to the Eagle. He instead called for better relations among police and communities in general and an end to enforcement practices that disproportionately affect Queens residents of color.

"I believe we need to improve relations between police and community and that we need to change the law enforcement culture in Queens County — by ending cash bail on low-level, non-violent offenses, by declining to prosecute some of those offenses and diverting others where appropriate," Lasak said. "As the only candidate in this race with the experience to do the job on day one, I'm the only candidate who can effectively make those changes."

Of the three DA candidates, Lancman has been the most outspoken opponent of "over-policing." At the same time, he has advocated for the addition of more NYPD officers.

In 2015, Lancman told the Observer that support for the NYPD and campaigns for police reform are not mutually exclusive. He highlighted his support for a City Council's push to add 1,000 new cops to the 2015 budget.

"The general public shouldn't forget that every single Council Member has a close working and often personal relationship with the police precincts in our respective districts — the commanding officers, community affairs officers, special operations officers, etc.," he told the Observer.

As chair of the City Council Committee on the Justice System, Lancman has sued the city and NYPD to release comprehensive fare evasion arrest data and sponsored a bill to end the use of chokeholds by police, but his support for more cops continues to rankle many criminal justice reformers in Queens, several people told the Eagle.

"That's going to follow him," Posada said.

Nevertheless, Lancman has made reform a central part of his campaign.

"Communities of color, in particular, are vastly over-policed, the first gear in the New Jim Crow machine, whereby an extraordinary number of people of color get criminal records early in life for relatively minor offenses that inhibit their ability to get an education, a job, and housing forever," Lancman wrote in an email. "In communities of color, the police over-use and misuse tactics like 'stop-and-frisk,' arrest people for minor offenses that are barely policed at all in white communities, resort to use of force much quicker and with deadlier effect, and are called upon to solve social problems like poverty and addiction that shouldn't be in the criminal justice system at all."

Lancman said prosecutors play a major role in influencing police priorities and exacerbating or limiting aggressive policing in communities of color.

"Too often, prosecutors are willing, if not eager, participants in this overcriminalization of people of color," Lancman said. "They abdicate their responsibility as their jurisdiction's chief law enforcement officer to ensure that the criminal justice system is fair, accountable, and focused on what really threatens the public's safety."

"As I like to say, the police can only police what prosecutors are willing to prosecute," he continued. "Beyond that, prosecutors must be more than merely the processors of the cases that the police bring them. They must direct the police toward prioritizing real public safety threats over maintaining 'control' over communities of color."

'L'-o Guv'na — Subway Shutdown Reversal Meets With Mixed Reviews in Queens

By Jaime DeJesus and David Brand
Queens Daily Eagle

What the “L” is Going On? Gov. Andrew Cuomo surprised New York City straphangers during a press conference on Thursday by announcing that the long-planned 15-month shutdown of the L-train subway service will not happen as originally planned. Construction had been scheduled to begin April 27 to repair the damage sustained by the Canarsie Tunnel in 2012 during Superstorm Sandy.

The sudden announcement received a mixed response in Queens, where thousands of residents live in neighborhoods near the L line, including Ridgewood, Maspeth, Middle Village and Glendale.

“My wife takes the L everyday because she works in Manhattan and she is very happy,” said taxi driver Marco Ortiz, who lives in Ridgewood. Ortiz said his wife is a housekeeper at a hotel in Midtown and will be affected by the proposed weekend service shutdown.

Low-wage workers are expected to bear the brunt of the new plan, which will shutdown service on weeknights and weekends.

Ortiz said he also thought the L train plan was a positive development for residents who live further from Manhattan in L train neighborhoods like Canarsie and Brownsville.

For his part, Ortiz said the shutdown will have an impact on his business, “but it’s okay.”

“I was thinking I’d be able to drive more people into Manhattan,” he said, laughing. “I’m happy though. The money I make is still good.”

The new plan is based on innovative tunnel construction technology, which was proposed by Columbia and Cornell Universities’ engineering departments and will eliminate the need for a full closure, something Cuomo called “a major breakthrough.”

The method has never been used in the United States and, Cuomo said, it “has never been used in a tunnel restoration project.”

“[The new method] uses many new innovations that are new to the rail industry in this country,” Cuomo explained. “But the MTA has gone through their recommendations and new design and believes it is feasible. It’s highly innovative but feasible.”

Keeping the L train in operation is key, Cuomo said.

“The simple fact is you have roughly 250,000 people who would need another way to get to work [and] a tremendous impact on traffic,” Cuomo said during the conference. “Fifteen months sounds like a really short period of time, but it’s not if you’re doing it one day at a time trying to get to work.”

“I can’t tell you how many people have approached me about the L train and the difficulty the L-train closure would trigger,” he said.

The city had spent years preparing for the shutdown by introducing more bike lanes in Brooklyn, expanding bike share service along the L line and proposing more bus service over the Williamsburg Bridge and along 14th Street.

The proposed shutdown had also affected real estate prices and sales in the area, an unwelcome proposition for landlords and homeowners looking to sell, but a form of price control for renters and buyers.

“Buyers are there, but they’re looking for steals,” real estate agent Nick Rafta said on Twitter. “I had a sales listing late last year and I’m amazed at how high turnout was at open houses, but all offers were laughingly far below market. The shutdown was their excuse.”

Gov. Andrew Cuomo said Thursday that he’s calling off a planned 15-month shutdown of the L train, a critical subway link between Manhattan and Brooklyn, saying a team of experts had come up with a way to overhaul a flood-damaged tunnel beneath the East River without closing it or even significantly curtailing service.

On Greene Avenue in Ridgewood, two adjacent homes have gone unsold for several months, partly owing to speculation about the L train, located about a half mile away at Dekalb Avenue.

“Public transportation is really important,” said real estate agent Tom Blacnco. “The first questions [among renters] is always, ‘I hear they’re shutting down the L. How long is it going to take?’”

The recommendations proposed by Cornell and Columbia include implementing a new power and control system design, implementing “racking” system design for cables and installing smart sensor systems to monitor benchwall integrity and more.

“Long story short, with this design, it would not be necessary to close the L-train tunnel at all, which would be a phenomenal benefit to the people of New York City,” Cuomo said. “There would need to be some night and weekend closures of only one tube, so service would still work because there are two tunnels.”

Cuomo claimed the new method would be the quickest and best way to rebuild the tunnels. The plan would still require work to be done on the lines during nights and weekends. Although many are happy with the news, some local residents are proceeding with trepidation.

North Brooklyn Chamber of Commerce President Paul Samulski, who is on the executive committee of the L Train Coalition, said the change of methodology was overall “a good thing.”

“Is everybody jumping for joy?” he went on. “I heard someone on NY1 say, ‘I hear a collective cheer from the West Side Highway of Manhattan all the way to Williamsburg.’ I haven’t personally heard that cheer. I’ve heard people breathe a sigh of relief, but we are moving very cautiously. Again, we think it’s very good news just like everyone else.”

But, he added, “We can’t help but sit back and say, ‘Why did it take so long?’”

Samulski stressed that the months of preparing for a total shutdown had been a burden to businesses and residents that rely on the train, who were expecting the shutdown to commence just a few months from now.

“We know that people have been very thoughtfully thinking through life decisions, whether it has to do with renegotiating a lease, or selling their business or moving it,” he explained. “People have made significant life decisions based on information that has been out there and now, what do we say to them? Do we say we’re sorry?”

Samulski also said that the weekend shutdowns are still a major issue.

“Even if it plays out the way they say, it’s still not going to be great,” he added. “We’ve seen a lot of temporary shutdowns and weekend closures. They do just as much damage, whether it’s short or long term. The recent L train shutdowns that happen on the weekends have been devastating to a lot of businesses.”

Many transportation advocates criticized the sudden announcement, saying they were skeptical of the last-minute change of plans.

“At the end of the day, what riders care about is whether the L train is repaired for the long term, and how much disruption it will take to get there,” said Riders Alliance Executive Director John Raskin. “The governor’s plan may or may not work, but you’ll pardon transit riders for being skeptical that a last-minute Hail Mary idea cooked up over Christmas is better than what the MTA came up with over three years of extensive public input.”

Raskin called on Cuomo to share more information about how the state arrived at the new plan.

“We need a full public release of the details of Governor Cuomo’s idea, as well as the mitigation plans that will allow hundreds of thousands of L train riders to get around during the inevitable shutdowns and slowdowns in service,” Raskin said. “Actual transit professionals, who owe nothing to the governor or the MTA, should evaluate whether this is sound engineering or a political stunt that will ultimately leave riders in the lurch.”

Transportation Alternatives Senior Organizer Erwin Figueroa said the new adjusted schedule would have a major impact on low-wage workers who work on nights and weekend.

“As always, poor and [people of color] New Yorkers will bear the brunt of this new “plan” for the L train, as shutdowns during nights and weekends will impact them the most,” Figueroa tweeted. “The bike lanes, busways and longer G trains need to remain as planned.”

Additional reporting by Sara Bosworth.

The L line stretches along the Brooklyn-Queens border for about a mile between the Halsey Street station and the Jefferson Avenue station.

from his job as a switch operator at the The New York Telephone Company after 41 years.

"It's tedious, but it is useful," said Henderson, who goes by the username Jim.henderson on Wikipedia. "The encyclopedia covers a huge number of things, and so do I."

Armed with a Nikon P610 camera and a Nexus 6P cellphone, Henderson navigates the city by bicycle via the streets and — when visiting the city's most diverse borough — the Brooklyn-Queens Greenway.

Henderson said he has uploaded more than 9,000 photographs, each depicting places like Queens Library's Flushing branch and the Grand Army Plaza fountain in Prospect Heights.

One of the first Queens photos he published on Wikipedia was the Civic Virtue statue that stands outside of Queens Borough Hall. Henderson also took a photo of Brooklyn Borough Hall that appeared on the institution's Wikipedia page for years.

But Henderson no longer seeks out the most prominent borough institutions when deciding what to photograph next. Instead, he uses the Wikimedia app to determine which sections of the city have not been so well-documented on Wikipedia, like neighborhoods and sites in Southeast Queens.

"For one thing, Southeast Queens is pretty light on account of there not being many famous places," Henderson said. "There are few registered historic places there, there are few New York City landmarks there, however there a few old and interesting buildings in Southeast Queens."

Though his photos have appeared in Gothamist, City Limits, DNAInfo, the Brooklyn Daily Eagle and, of course, the Queens Daily Eagle, Henderson says he has never sought payment for his photographs.

"I've never been compensated for my photos. I've never been paid a dime, never looked for it," Henderson said.

Henderson's early photos are listed under the public domain — meaning the photo can be used for any purpose, without citation — his more recent photos are categorized under a Creative Commons 3.0 tag, meaning that anyone is free to distribute the photos, as long as Henderson is given attribution in the form of "Jim.henderson via Wikimedia commons" or by providing a link to the license.

said he often encounters media outlets that either do not properly cite his work properly or that neglect to cite it at all.

Henderson said he has no plans to stop taking photographs and will soon surpass over 10,000 photo uploads on Wikipedia.

Ozone Park is next up on his list of places to photograph.

Henderson said he plans to visit the Workman Bicycle Factory on 100th Street. He will also bike to LaGuardia Airport and the soon-to-be-built Kosciuszko Bridge that will connect Maspeth and Greenpoint.

"I hope to die this way, I've found my place," Henderson said. "For someone who is fairly bright and well-read, but scatterbrained, this is the place."

Queens Murder Suspect Busted After Standoff With Cops

By Christina Carrega
Queens Daily Eagle

A Prospect Lefferts Garden man who is wanted for the murder of a Queens man was arrested on Friday following a two-hour-plus standoff with police.

Last year, Wilbert Bryant was indicted in Brooklyn Federal Court along with four others for charges in connection to the October 2017 death of Hani Kasem, the owner of Garden Valley Distribution in Ozone Park. Four of the co-conspirators were taken into custody and variously arraigned on a nine-count indictment as Bryant remained on the lam.

On Friday, police reported to Maple Street in Prospect Lefferts Gardens around 5:30 a.m. to investigate a report of shots fired inside a home. Bryant, 54, allegedly barricaded himself inside an apartment until law enforcement authorities made their way in, the New York Post reported.

Bryant was taken into custody around 8 a.m. Friday morning and was scheduled to face Magistrate Judge Peggy Kuo on Friday afternoon for the conspiracy to murder charges, according to a spokesman for the U.S. Attorney Richard Donoghue.

If convicted, Bryant faces a minimum of 10 years to life in prison.

The five men are accused of working together to shake down 64-year-old Kasem to collect on a loan he had taken out to buy merchandise for his family-owned grocery distribution center.

Bryant and two other loan sharks, dressed in blazers, walked into the distribution center in Ozone Park on 101st Avenue. They pistol-whipped Kasem's son before they killed Kasem as his son watched, prosecutors said.
