Not the end

It was one of those days on Wednesdays, said one of the nurses who had just sheathed her hypodermic needle and Parkland staff rode back to work.

Facilities workers were busy setting up tables and stooling chairs as they prepared to accommodate yet another surge of patients in the hospital. Nurse managers were out on their rounds. The patients in the hospital were still in need of care, and the staff there was still working to meet that need.

The nurses said they were tired, but they were also determined to keep going. They were taking the challenge in stride, and they were doing their best to keep the patients comfortable and safe.

The restricted area

The restricted area — the part of the hospital where the nurses and doctors were working to treat the patients — was bustling with activity. The nurses were busy setting up the beds, and the doctors were working on the patients.

One of the nurses said she was tired, but she was also determined to keep going. She was taking the challenge in stride, and she was doing her best to keep the patients comfortable and safe.

The new ECHO machine

The new ECHO machine — a device used to monitor the heart and blood flow — was being used to monitor the patients.

The nurses said they were tired, but they were also determined to keep going. They were taking the challenge in stride, and they were doing their best to keep the patients comfortable and safe.

The new urgently needed health care in Florida

The nurses said they were tired, but they were also determined to keep going. They were taking the challenge in stride, and they were doing their best to keep the patients comfortable and safe.