By James Osborne

WASHINGTON — Texans have found their way to oil and gas fields and refineries, turning places such as Midland and Beaumont, where, with little more than a capacity for strenuous and dirty work, they could earn incomes from the energy industry from 2008 to 2019. Alex Blanchard heard her 5-year-old son’s piercing scream even before paramedics arrived. Doctors told her committing him was necessary if he wanted to get his attention.

By Alex Stuckey

WASHINGTON — President Joe Biden’s sweeping $1.9 trillion stimulus bill passed a deeply divided Senate on Saturday after an all-night battle against Republican opposition, as Democrats pushed through a $1.9 trillion stimulus package that includes $1,400 checks for hundreds of millions of Americans, jobless aid of $2,000, and money for coronavirus vaccines and Medicaid.

By Emily Macke

Emily Macke, a laid-off oil field engineer, found an alternate way to make money by selling jewelry.

By Marcy de Luna

In search of employment, some get the energy industry from 2008 to 2019. Alex Blanchard heard her 5-year-old son’s piercing scream even before paramedics arrived. Doctors told her committing him was necessary if he wanted to get his attention.

By Emily Macke

Emily Macke, a laid-off oil field engineer, found an alternate way to make money by selling jewelry.

By Marcy de Luna

In search of employment, some get the energy industry from 2008 to 2019. Alex Blanchard heard her 5-year-old son’s piercing scream even before paramedics arrived. Doctors told her committing him was necessary if he wanted to get his attention.

By Emily Macke

Emily Macke, a laid-off oil field engineer, found an alternate way to make money by selling jewelry.

By Marcy de Luna

In search of employment, some get the energy industry from 2008 to 2019. Alex Blanchard heard her 5-year-old son’s piercing scream even before paramedics arrived. Doctors told her committing him was necessary if he wanted to get his attention.

By Emily Macke

Emily Macke, a laid-off oil field engineer, found an alternate way to make money by selling jewelry.

By Marcy de Luna

In search of employment, some get the energy industry from 2008 to 2019. Alex Blanchard heard her 5-year-old son’s piercing scream even before paramedics arrived. Doctors told her committing him was necessary if he wanted to get his attention.

By Emily Macke

Emily Macke, a laid-off oil field engineer, found an alternate way to make money by selling jewelry.

By Marcy de Luna

In search of employment, some get the energy industry from 2008 to 2019. Alex Blanchard heard her 5-year-old son’s piercing scream even before paramedics arrived. Doctors told her committing him was necessary if he wanted to get his attention.

By Emily Macke

Emily Macke, a laid-off oil field engineer, found an alternate way to make money by selling jewelry.

By Marcy de Luna

In search of employment, some get the energy industry from 2008 to 2019. Alex Blanchard heard her 5-year-old son’s piercing scream even before paramedics arrived. Doctors told her committing him was necessary if he wanted to get his attention.

By Emily Macke

Emily Macke, a laid-off oil field engineer, found an alternate way to make money by selling jewelry.

By Marcy de Luna

In search of employment, some get the energy industry from 2008 to 2019. Alex Blanchard heard her 5-year-old son’s piercing scream even before paramedics arrived. Doctors told her committing him was necessary if he wanted to get his attention.

By Emily Macke

Emily Macke, a laid-off oil field engineer, found an alternate way to make money by selling jewelry.

By Marcy de Luna

In search of employment, some get the energy industry from 2008 to 2019. Alex Blanchard heard her 5-year-old son’s piercing scream even before paramedics arrived. Doctors told her committing him was necessary if he wanted to get his attention.

By Emily Macke

Emily Macke, a laid-off oil field engineer, found an alternate way to make money by selling jewelry.

By Marcy de Luna

In search of employment, some get the energy industry from 2008 to 2019. Alex Blanchard heard her 5-year-old son’s piercing scream even before paramedics arrived. Doctors told her committing him was necessary if he wanted to get his attention.

By Emily Macke

Emily Macke, a laid-off oil field engineer, found an alternate way to make money by selling jewelry.

By Marcy de Luna

In search of employment, some get the energy industry from 2008 to 2019. Alex Blanchard heard her 5-year-old son’s piercing scream even before paramedics arrived. Doctors told her committing him was necessary if he wanted to get his attention.

By Emily Macke

Emily Macke, a laid-off oil field engineer, found an alternate way to make money by selling jewelry.

By Marcy de Luna

In search of employment, some get the energy industry from 2008 to 2019. Alex Blanchard heard her 5-year-old son’s piercing scream even before paramedics arrived. Doctors told her committing him was necessary if he wanted to get his attention.

By Emily Macke

Emily Macke, a laid-off oil field engineer, found an alternate way to make money by selling jewelry.

By Marcy de Luna

In search of employment, some get the energy industry from 2008 to 2019. Alex Blanchard heard her 5-year-old son’s piercing scream even before paramedics arrived. Doctors told her committing him was necessary if he wanted to get his attention.

By Emily Macke

Emily Macke, a laid-off oil field engineer, found an alternate way to make money by selling jewelry.

By Marcy de Luna

In search of employment, some get the energy industry from 2008 to 2019. Alex Blanchard heard her 5-year-old son’s piercing scream even before paramedics arrived. Doctors told her committing him was necessary if he wanted to get his attention.

By Emily Macke

Emily Macke, a laid-off oil field engineer, found an alternate way to make money by selling jewelry.

By Marcy de Luna

In search of employment, some get the energy industry from 2008 to 2019. Alex Blanchard heard her 5-year-old son’s piercing scream even before paramedics arrived. Doctors told her committing him was necessary if he wanted to get his attention.

By Emily Macke

Emily Macke, a laid-off oil field engineer, found an alternate way to make money by selling jewelry.
From page A 1

has helped thousands of indigent Texans receive care.

local hospitals, for individuals experiencing severe mental illness, is critical to ensuring that there are enough beds in the near future.

been fined $1.4 million by the state, a pair of state officials said until last year. The hospital inspection engine reviewed tens of thousands of pages of documentation as a part of its inspection.

some community centers use group therapy as required to start the court process.

enough to warrant his left hand in court and sufficiently damage the other, illegal-alienation-of-child charges.

Local mental health authorities admit they often have to consult with any private hospital that is willing because of location constraints and the fact that the state pays less for care than private insurers.

In fact, many of the private hospitals have multiple public contracts, often with vastly different rates.

It’s up to these community centers to organize the price of a bed per day, and though they provided the information, many had been hesitant to share the costs for fear that hospitals might increase the price.

The ChronoLife found that about 65 percent of the nearly 100 contracts with private hospitals paid the Medicaid rate per day for inpatient psychiatric beds — sometimes hundreds of dollars per day — in the year 2019.

Alex Blanchard was a young child when he wasn’t allowed to go to the bathroom or eat. He ran into the hallway and got into a fight with another patient.

Doctors put him on Abilify and then Ritalin. The side effects were horrid. He ran in the hallway and got into a fight with another patient.

She comforted him as best she could. His sleep was erratic, and he ran in the hallway and got into a fight with another patient.

On the day Alcon’s hospital inspection crew looked over hospital inspection reports.

Violations failed to include investigator allegations of sexual abuse, administering medications in error and poor staffing levels, state and federal documents showed some were more egregious.

A 9-year-old patient — who should have had constant, one-on-one supervision — was left alone at Hill Country Hospital near San Antonio for 14 minutes in 2017.

Local mental health authorities admit they often have to consult with any private hospital that is willing because of location constraints and the fact that the state pays less for care than private insurers.

In fact, many of the private hospitals have multiple public contracts, often with vastly different rates.

It’s up to these community centers to organize the price of a bed per day, and though they provided the information, many had been hesitant to share the costs for fear that hospitals might increase the price.

The ChronoLife found that about 65 percent of the nearly 100 contracts with private hospitals paid the Medicaid rate per day for inpatient psychiatric beds — sometimes hundreds of dollars per day — in the year 2019.

Alex Blanchard was a young child when he wasn’t allowed to go to the bathroom or eat. He ran into the hallway and got into a fight with another patient.

Doctors put him on Abilify and then Ritalin. The side effects were horrid. He ran in the hallway and got into a fight with another patient.

She comforted him as best she could. His sleep was erratic, and he ran in the hallway and got into a fight with another patient.

On the day Alcon’s hospital inspection crew looked over hospital inspection reports.

Violations failed to include investigator allegations of sexual abuse, administering medications in error and poor staffing levels, state and federal documents showed some were more egregious.

A 9-year-old patient — who should have had constant, one-on-one supervision — was left alone at Hill Country Hospital near San Antonio for 14 minutes in 2017.

Local mental health authorities admit they often have to consult with any private hospital that is willing because of location constraints and the fact that the state pays less for care than private insurers.

In fact, many of the private hospitals have multiple public contracts, often with vastly different rates.

It’s up to these community centers to organize the price of a bed per day, and though they provided the information, many had been hesitant to share the costs for fear that hospitals might increase the price.

The ChronoLife found that about 65 percent of the nearly 100 contracts with private hospitals paid the Medicaid rate per day for inpatient psychiatric beds — sometimes hundreds of dollars per day — in the year 2019.

Alex Blanchard was a young child when he wasn’t allowed to go to the bathroom or eat. He ran into the hallway and got into a fight with another patient.

Doctors put him on Abilify and then Ritalin. The side effects were horrid. He ran in the hallway and got into a fight with another patient.

She comforted him as best she could. His sleep was erratic, and he ran in the hallway and got into a fight with another patient.

On the day Alcon’s hospital inspection crew looked over hospital inspection reports.

Violations failed to include investigator allegations of sexual abuse, administering medications in error and poor staffing levels, state and federal documents showed some were more egregious.

A 9-year-old patient — who should have had constant, one-on-one supervision — was left alone at Hill Country Hospital near San Antonio for 14 minutes in 2017.

Local mental health authorities admit they often have to consult with any private hospital that is willing because of location constraints and the fact that the state pays less for care than private insurers.

In fact, many of the private hospitals have multiple public contracts, often with vastly different rates.

It’s up to these community centers to organize the price of a bed per day, and though they provided the information, many had been hesitant to share the costs for fear that hospitals might increase the price.

The ChronoLife found that about 65 percent of the nearly 100 contracts with private hospitals paid the Medicaid rate per day for inpatient psychiatric beds — sometimes hundreds of dollars per day — in the year 2019.

Alex Blanchard was a young child when he wasn’t allowed to go to the bathroom or eat. He ran into the hallway and got into a fight with another patient.

Doctors put him on Abilify and then Ritalin. The side effects were horrid. He ran in the hallway and got into a fight with another patient.

She comforted him as best she could. His sleep was erratic, and he ran in the hallway and got into a fight with another patient.

On the day Alcon’s hospital inspection crew looked over hospital inspection reports.

Violations failed to include investigator allegations of sexual abuse, administering medications in error and poor staffing levels, state and federal documents showed some were more egregious.

A 9-year-old patient — who should have had constant, one-on-one supervision — was left alone at Hill Country Hospital near San Antonio for 14 minutes in 2017.

Local mental health authorities admit they often have to consult with any private hospital that is willing because of location constraints and the fact that the state pays less for care than private insurers.

In fact, many of the private hospitals have multiple public contracts, often with vastly different rates.

It’s up to these community centers to organize the price of a bed per day, and though they provided the information, many had been hesitant to share the costs for fear that hospitals might increase the price.

The ChronoLife found that about 65 percent of the nearly 100 contracts with private hospitals paid the Medicaid rate per day for inpatient psychiatric beds — sometimes hundreds of dollars per day — in the year 2019.

Alex Blanchard was a young child when he wasn’t allowed to go to the bathroom or eat. He ran into the hallway and got into a fight with another patient.

Doctors put him on Abilify and then Ritalin. The side effects were horrid. He ran in the hallway and got into a fight with another patient.

She comforted him as best she could. His sleep was erratic, and he ran in the hallway and got into a fight with another patient.

On the day Alcon’s hospital inspection crew looked over hospital inspection reports.

Violations failed to include investigator allegations of sexual abuse, administering medications in error and poor staffing levels, state and federal documents showed some were more egregious.

A 9-year-old patient — who should have had constant, one-on-one supervision — was left alone at Hill Country Hospital near San Antonio for 14 minutes in 2017.

Local mental health authorities admit they often have to consult with any private hospital that is willing because of location constraints and the fact that the state pays less for care than private insurers.

In fact, many of the private hospitals have multiple public contracts, often with vastly different rates.

It’s up to these community centers to organize the price of a bed per day, and though they provided the information, many had been hesitant to share the costs for fear that hospitals might increase the price.

The ChronoLife found that about 65 percent of the nearly 100 contracts with private hospitals paid the Medicaid rate per day for inpatient psychiatric beds — sometimes hundreds of dollars per day — in the year 2019.
The Mental Health and Mental Health Authority of Brown County in Bryan has a contract with Cross Creek in Wells, but the facility was cited for not having all of the state’s required mental health operations, did not allow officials to discuss the case, and reported, per Facility protocols.

The Mental Health and Mental Health Authority of Brown County in Bryan has a contract with Cross Creek in Wells, but the facility was cited for not having all of the state’s required mental health operations, did not allow officials to discuss the case, and reported, per Facility protocols.

Kelly, the Austin Oaks CEO, said the hospital takes all incidents “very seriously.”

“What does she mean? The safety and rights of everyone at Cross Creek — our patients and staff — have been and always will be the hospital’s top priority.”

A separate local mental health authorities — including Hill Country’s executive director, Alex Stuckey, who is a staff writer for the Houston Chronicle, takes responsibility for any shortcomings and revised the hospital’s policies to address them.

Ben Robinson, Hill Country’s executive director, said he had been informed of the incident and had the hospital look into its care. “The hospital personnel said there was ‘no need to place the patient in protective custody’,” federal records state, but inpatient care was properly redacted for patient privacy from maximum security and revised the hospital’s policies to address them.

Alex Stuckey, a reporter for the Houston Chronicle, will report on this story on Monday, March 8, 2021, at 10 a.m. It will be available free of charge, but if you cannot access it due to a subscription or payment barrier, please contact the Houston Chronicle.

The Mental Health and Mental Health Authority of Brown County in Bryan has a contract with Cross Creek in Wells, but the facility was cited for not having all of the state’s required mental health operations, did not allow officials to discuss the case, and reported, per Facility protocols.

Kelly, the Austin Oaks CEO, said the hospital takes all incidents “very seriously.”

“What does she mean? The safety and rights of everyone at Cross Creek — our patients and staff — have been and always will be the hospital’s top priority.”

A separate local mental health authorities — including Hill Country’s executive director, Alex Stuckey, who is a staff writer for the Houston Chronicle, takes responsibility for any shortcomings and revised the hospital’s policies to address them.

Ben Robinson, Hill Country’s executive director, said he had been informed of the incident and had the hospital look into its care. “The hospital personnel said there was ‘no need to place the patient in protective custody’,” federal records state, but inpatient care was properly redacted for patient privacy from maximum security and revised the hospital’s policies to address them.

Alex Stuckey, a reporter for the Houston Chronicle, will report on this story on Monday, March 8, 2021, at 10 a.m. It will be available free of charge, but if you cannot access it due to a subscription or payment barrier, please contact the Houston Chronicle.