Kim takes back the global spotlight

With weapons test, N. Korean leader seeks attention and legitimacy

BY ANNA FEIFEL

TOKYO — Kim Jong Un threatened Friday to analyze the threat to North Korea’s regime by declaring an immediate resumption of nuclear tests.

But the regime’s actions in recent weeks have continued to raise concerns about the possibility of a new round of nuclear tests, which would further complicate the already tense situation on the Korean Peninsula.

In a statement released late Thursday, Kim said that the North Korean leader had ordered a series of measures to address the economic challenges facing the country, including the resumption of nuclear tests.

The statement, which was released by the Korean Central News Agency, said that the country would continue to conduct nuclear tests “to ensure the survival of the regime and the people.”

The statement also said that the North Korean leader had ordered the resumption of the country’s nuclear program, which was halted in 2007.

North Korea has conducted five nuclear tests since 2006, the latest of which took place in January. The tests have raised concerns about the country’s ability to develop a nuclear weapon and the possibility of a nuclear arms race in the region.

The North Korean government has consistently denied that it has a nuclear weapons program and has stated that it is committed to denuclearization.

The United States has repeatedly called for North Korea to abandon its nuclear program and has threatened military action if the country continues to develop nuclear weapons.

On Friday, the United States said it would continue to press for a diplomatic solution to the nuclear crisis, but warned that military action could not be ruled out if the North Korean government does not change its behavior.

The Trump administration has also increased pressure on North Korea by imposing new sanctions and cutting off aid to the country.

However, experts say that the North Korean government is unlikely to respond to this pressure with a change in its nuclear program.

They say that the country’s leaders are too ideologically committed to the nuclear program and too dependent on the program for their survival to give it up.

Meanwhile, there has been a surge in interest in the country’s potential for nuclear weapons development, with some experts suggesting that the country could have enough nuclear material to build a bomb within months.

The United States has also begun to consider the possibility of a military strike on North Korea, with some analysts suggesting that a limited strike could be effective in preventing the country from developing nuclear weapons.

However, many experts say that a military strike would be a last resort and that it would likely result in a massive loss of life and property.

The United States has also begun to consider the possibility of a military strike on North Korea, with some analysts suggesting that a limited strike could be effective in preventing the country from developing nuclear weapons.

However, many experts say that a military strike would be a last resort and that it would likely result in a massive loss of life and property.

The United States has also begun to consider the possibility of a military strike on North Korea, with some analysts suggesting that a limited strike could be effective in preventing the country from developing nuclear weapons.

However, many experts say that a military strike would be a last resort and that it would likely result in a massive loss of life and property.

The United States has also begun to consider the possibility of a military strike on North Korea, with some analysts suggesting that a limited strike could be effective in preventing the country from developing nuclear weapons.

However, many experts say that a military strike would be a last resort and that it would likely result in a massive loss of life and property.

The United States has also begun to consider the possibility of a military strike on North Korea, with some analysts suggesting that a limited strike could be effective in preventing the country from developing nuclear weapons.

However, many experts say that a military strike would be a last resort and that it would likely result in a massive loss of life and property.

The United States has also begun to consider the possibility of a military strike on North Korea, with some analysts suggesting that a limited strike could be effective in preventing the country from developing nuclear weapons.

However, many experts say that a military strike would be a last resort and that it would likely result in a massive loss of life and property.

The United States has also begun to consider the possibility of a military strike on North Korea, with some analysts suggesting that a limited strike could be effective in preventing the country from developing nuclear weapons.

However, many experts say that a military strike would be a last resort and that it would likely result in a massive loss of life and property.

The United States has also begun to consider the possibility of a military strike on North Korea, with some analysts suggesting that a limited strike could be effective in preventing the country from developing nuclear weapons.

However, many experts say that a military strike would be a last resort and that it would likely result in a massive loss of life and property.

The United States has also begun to consider the possibility of a military strike on North Korea, with some analysts suggesting that a limited strike could be effective in preventing the country from developing nuclear weapons.

However, many experts say that a military strike would be a last resort and that it would likely result in a massive loss of life and property.

The United States has also begun to consider the possibility of a military strike on North Korea, with some analysts suggesting that a limited strike could be effective in preventing the country from developing nuclear weapons.

However, many experts say that a military strike would be a last resort and that it would likely result in a massive loss of life and property.

The United States has also begun to consider the possibility of a military strike on North Korea, with some analysts suggesting that a limited strike could be effective in preventing the country from developing nuclear weapons.

However, many experts say that a military strike would be a last resort and that it would likely result in a massive loss of life and property.

The United States has also begun to consider the possibility of a military strike on North Korea, with some analysts suggesting that a limited strike could be effective in preventing the country from developing nuclear weapons.

However, many experts say that a military strike would be a last resort and that it would likely result in a massive loss of life and property.

The United States has also begun to consider the possibility of a military strike on North Korea, with some analysts suggesting that a limited strike could be effective in preventing the country from developing nuclear weapons.

However, many experts say that a military strike would be a last resort and that it would likely result in a massive loss of life and property.

The United States has also begun to consider the possibility of a military strike on North Korea, with some analysts suggesting that a limited strike could be effective in preventing the country from developing nuclear weapons.

However, many experts say that a military strike would be a last resort and that it would likely result in a massive loss of life and property.
British envoy makes diplomatic departure

Ambassador Peter Westmacott prepared his farewell address with references to "Devonian Abbey."