Our Commitment to Food Justice

As a food rescue charity, we support many households, individuals, and organizations that struggle to access food - a basic human right. We work with anyone and everyone willing to join us on our mission to feed our community. We also operate on the fringe of a broken food system founded on colonialism, capitalism, and white supremacy. Those who experience the highest rate of food insecurity and oppression are Black, Indigenous, and racialized communities.

At Food Stash Foundation, we recognize that food justice cannot be obtained without racial and environmental justice. Social (in)equity, economic (in)security, and environmental conditions are all connected and need to be considered together when striving for a just world. That is why we stand in solidarity with Indigenous and Black individuals and People of Colour and strive to learn more about what justice and liberation looks like for our community.

There's a long way to go, but we at Food Stash commit to growing our advocacy and educational capacities to stand up for and lead the way to a more sustainable, just, and equitable food system [and society]. Together, we commit to pushing the boundaries in what we do to ensure our world does not go back to normal.
