Theatre is an art form. It is not journalism. It is metaphor. It plays with and against the historical narrative, data, and facts as it creates a work rooted in and true to its own point of view and artistic truth. It is the plays of Shakespeare, the films of John Ford and the novels of Doctorow. At its best it is the reenactment of the great subconscious myths and yearnings that define the human spirit.

On the cover:
In Pursuit of Freedom
A Project by Brooklyn Historical Society, Irondale Ensemble Project, and Weeksville Heritage Center

In Pursuit of Freedom recovers the role that Brooklyn played in one of the most tumultuous periods of American history. It is an ambitious, multi-site, multi-faceted project that will restore the story of abolitionism and anti-slavery activism to the popular understanding of the Borough’s history. It will reveal how black and white Brooklynites were engaged in the national struggle to eradicate slavery and demand racial and social justice. Using the latest research and scholarship it will return Brooklyn to its rightful place, alongside Boston, Philadelphia, and Manhattan, in the history of anti-slavery and abolitionism.

In Pursuit of Freedom draws on the resources and capacities of three of Brooklyn’s leading cultural organizations, Brooklyn Historical Society, Weeksville Heritage Center, and Irondale Ensemble Project, and like the subject it addresses, it will pervade the Borough. The drama of the abolitionist movement is manifest in the physical environment. Many communities still meet in churches that were centers of resistance. The Brooklyn waterfront is a reminder of the city’s exchange and trade with the Southern slave holding states.

Each of the three project partners will house a permanent exhibition, focusing on a specific aspect of the subject that speaks to the institution’s strengths. Although each exhibition could be enjoyed alone, together they will give a complete and compelling overview of the current scholarship on abolitionism, anti-slavery and Brooklyn. The parallel themes of the exhibitions will be brought together on the specially designed In Pursuit of Freedom interactive website, where visitors will meet the people, see the places and discover more about the events that constitute the story. In Pursuit of Freedom walking tours of the borough will also be available to view, print, or use on mobile devices.

At the Irondale Center, the Irondale Ensemble Project has created a new play, Color Between the Lines. The new play with original music is being presented initially at the Irondale Center through May 24th and will subsequently tour to other places in Brooklyn. A version will also be prepared as part of the extensive education program being developed for In Pursuit of Freedom and will either be presented to school groups at the Irondale Center or toured to the Borough’s public schools.

A special In Pursuit of Freedom curriculum is being developed, which is designed to meet and integrate with all New York City and State curricula standards, and professional development support will be offered to Brooklyn teachers. Within a few years it is expected that all Brooklyn school students will be introduced to the Borough’s history of abolitionism and anti-slavery activism.

In Pursuit of Freedom brings to life one of the most important stories in Brooklyn’s history. In showing the ways that the past still lives in today’s streets and alleyways, it will be a powerful and unexpected guide through some of the borough’s most fascinating corners. It will remind us that legacy of racial inequality is a powerful influence on all our lives; even as Brooklyn again becomes a cultural, tourist, and economic engine for the region, we are still grappling with its consequences. The search for social justice continues and provides a forum for discussion and debate on the continuing impact of the actions of our nineteenth-century forebears.

Lafayette Avenue Presbyterian Church

When Irondale discovered a neglected, long-forgotten former Sunday school space in the historic Lafayette Avenue Presbyterian Church, in Fort Greene, Brooklyn, the ensemble company saw its future - a vibrant, 7,300-square foot center for creating and presenting inventive theater, as well as education and outreach.

The LAPC was organized in 1857, at a time when the issue of slavery dominated the national debate. From the onset the church was known as a "temple of abolition". Through friends, its founding pastor pressed President Lincoln relentlessly on the issue of emancipation, both before and during the Civil War. The annex was used as an auditorium for speakers, including Frederick Douglas and Charles Dickens. It was also the site of the first demonstration in Brooklyn of the telephone by Alexander Graham Bell.

The setting offers a perfect match with a like-minded organization, a culturally diverse church with activist roots. And it also provides an opportunity for Irondale to play an important role in an exiting and growing cultural district.

Irondale Young Company!
A Professionally Trained Teen Ensemble

Irondale's Young Company is created using the same model that created the Irondale Ensemble Project. We use the same ensemble training techniques, the same games and exercises that the Irondale Ensemble uses. Just as the professional company grew out of the interests and talents of the original members, the Young Company develops in the same way. This is a free program open to all teens.

Irondale Ensemble Project

The Irondale Ensemble Project is an experimental theater ensemble established in 1983 by Terry Greiss, Jim Niesen and Barbara Mackenzie-Wood. The company creates and presents original work, through the research and exploration of emerging themes in our society. Our theater and our artists engage the wider community by forging deep partnerships with schools, prisons, shelters, and other organizations, and at our home, the Irondale Center for Theater, Education, and Outreach. Irondale's full-time artists have a commitment to making plays and education programs that are socially relevant, challenge the status quo and inspire fresh perspectives in our audiences. Irondale has produced 43 major Off-Broadway shows including the American Premier of Brecht’s Conversations in Exile, radical reinterpetations of Chekhov, Ibsen, Sophocles and Shakespeare, and 12 original works created collaboratively by the company.

Since its inception, Irondale, in addition to developing and performing its own theatrical pieces, has conducted extensive programs of educational and social outreach work. The combination of the company’s own daily rehearsal and performance work in conjunction with the paratheatrical use of Irondale techniques as a means of educating, and addressing social issues, has done much to shape the politics of Irondale as a company and to determine the nature and direction of its ongoing experiments.

Irondale Mission Statement

Through the power of the ensemble process, Irondale creates and presents theatre, performance and educational programs that challenge traditional assumptions about art, and help us to better interpret contemporary culture. The Irondale Center, our theater, laboratory, and classroom, is a home for ensemble artists of all disciplines and cultures, and a resource for our community.

The Irondale Center

In September, 2008 Irondale moved into its first permanent home: the historic Lafayette Avenue Presbyterian Church, located in the BAM Cultural District in Fort Greene, Brooklyn. The Irondale Center for Theater, Education, and Outreach will be the performance and education-base for Irondale, NET ensembles, community-centered theater arts and education programs.

A Note from the Director:

It has been a pleasure to direct HARRIET TUBMAN: WHEN I CROSSED THAT LINE TO FREEDOM. In addition to the challenge of bringing this epic story to life, it was wonderful to see Ms. Tubman through the eyes of composer Nkeiru Okoye.

Because of the constant reference of the railroad that accompanies Ms. Tubman’s legacy and the ever present metaphor of the train in African American history, I thought it would be most appropriate to put the telling of this story in that context. I also wanted to let the story unfold through the music and action and not let too many elements like set and props get in the way of that.

I hope you will enjoy this journey and come take a ride on the train that takes us from young Araminta’s life in slavery to Harriet Tubman’s brave journey to free her loved ones.

A Note from the Composer

“I looked at my hands to see if I was the same person,” sings the protagonist in HARRIET TUBMAN: WHEN I CROSSED THAT LINE TO FREEDOM. In real life Tubman made the statement when describing her first taste of freedom to journalist, Sarah Bradford. But in the same utterance, she admits to mixed feelings about being free while her family remained in bondage. These conflicting emotions from a noteworthy heroine were so compelling, that they became the root of my opera.

Many people know about Harriet Tubman as the legendary American hero; and when originally embarking on this journey of my first opera, I was prepared to write a fictionalized Underground Railroad encounter with Tubman. However, since that had been done already, I decided to find Tubman as a human being beyond her enslavement and liberation of others. This was accomplished through three years of reading recent biographies, fieldwork on Maryland’s Eastern shore, collaborating with biographers, researching abolitionists, and reading slave narratives and accounts of life specific to where she lived.

My telling of Araminta “Harriet” Ross Tubman’s story involves a community touched by her activities: the close-knit family into which she was born, her real life love interest – a free man named John Tubman, and the abolitionists William Still, stationmaster of the Philadelphia Underground Railroad Station, and Reverend Samuel Green who secreted slaves out of Tubman’s community. Tying the story together is the bond between Tubman and her sister Rachel who promise that “nothing but the grave” will tear them apart.

The opera’s grounding in folk music gives it yet another dimension – one that is educational, while entertaining. Between spirituals, juba, ragtime, field hollers, work songs, gospel, jazz, and shouts, the opera remains surprisingly contemporary, interweaving these idioms, seamlessly, with Western traditions.

I want to thank all the people in my life who have taken this artistic journey with me, especially: Charles, Mila, Matt, Bob, Bill, and the rest of the crew at American Opera Projects, who turned me into an opera composer; Kate Clifford Larson, for encouragement and for writing BOUND FOR THE PROMISED LAND, which helped me understand Tubman’s mission; Noel DaCosta (in memoriam), who believed in me from the beginning, and whom I believe is smiling down at me somewhere; Wendell Logan (in memoriam), whose RUNAGATE, RUNAGATE inspired “My Name is Harriet, Now,” and so much more; Alvin Singleton, who introduced the project to the John Duffy Composer Institute, Diana Solomon Glover, for singing the songs and bringing the project to the attention of ALT; Adrienne Danrich, who brought it to the attention of AOP; Director Beth Greenberg, who helped shape the vision for the opera; Mimi Stern-Wolfe, who produced the original first

SYNOPSIS
HARRIET TUBMAN: WHEN I CROSSED THAT LINE TO FREEDOM is a two act folk opera for singers and chamber ensemble that tells of how a young girl born in slavery, becomes Harriet Tubman, the legendary Underground Railroad conductor and American hero.

ACT I: In Slavery
Born into slavery, the young Araminta “Minty” Ross is sent away from the only home she’s known, in order to work for various masters. Despite the melancholy of her upbringing, which includes watching three sisters being sold away on a chain gang, she sings about how ‘very happy,’ she is that her “family gets to stay together.”

Community members chronicle her mishaps over the next several years as she is shuttled between various masters and as many maladies. This comes to a head when the teenaged Araminta is injured so badly, that she is sent home to heal from a comat. Araminta eventually recovers, having been nursed by her mother and her sister, Rachel, but she is left with sudden ‘sleeping spells’ as a reminder of what has taken place. Unable to sell her, and deeming her unfit for being hired out, Araminta’s master decrees that she will learn the trade of lumbering from her father, a woodsman.

While waiting to escort the sleeping Araminta to her first day of forestry lessons, younger sister Rachel sings about her own desire to be married and have children. Araminta hears Rachel’s song and encourages her to keep hope instead of fear. She and Araminta make a blood oath that “nothing but the grave will ever tear them apart.” The sisters travel to a forest clearing where their father, Ben, and brothers serenade them with a mapping song that shows life’s lessons through chopping wood. Having blossomed into a young woman through her years of tree chopping, Araminta changes her name to Harriet.

As the plantation residents gather on a Sunday, a free man named John Tubman woos Harriet into becoming his wife. John and Harriet make plans to work and wait while saving money to buy Harriet’s freedom. The plantation erupts into near hysteria when the plantation owner dies and rumors of impending sale surface. Harriet steals away one night, in order to avoid being sold. Aware that she is defying John’s direct order and risking life as she knew it, she leaves, singing a final farewell to the community she loved.
ACT II: In Freedom

Philadelphia-based abolitionist William Still presides over a meeting of the Philadelphia Anti-Slavery Society, where those who are gathered recite the code words associated with their covert assisting of runaways. The meeting’s guest speaker is Harriet, who has become an abolitionist in her own right over two years of being free.

Back at the plantation, the folks at home use the Slave Grapevine to send a message to Harriet, who has sent word about her intending to visit them. The family is delighted when Harriet returns; however John Tubman refuses to see his estranged wife. Instead, he tells her father and brothers that he has moved on. Harriet persuades some slaves to journey north with her, but Rachel declines the offer, as she is with child.

Over the years of Harriet’s returning for rescue missions, and some slaves leaving the area without her help, the plantation is guarded more heavily. When news of another impending visit from Harriet reaches the plantation, Rachel is advised to run with her at any cost. Rachel balks at the advice, as she could never leave the plantation without her husband and children. When Harriet returns to the plantation, Ben greets her, but is wearing a blindfold. He explains this is because he always tells the truth, and wants to be able to say, he hadn’t seen her, if asked. Rachel again declines to travel with Harriet, as her un-weaned baby could not survive the trip.

In Pennsylvania, William Still and the abolitionists are in an uproar due to the passing of the Fugitive Slave Act. The meeting calms as Still introduces would-be speaker, Harriet Tubman; however when she fails to appear, Ben and Ritta take the stage. Introducing themselves as Harriet’s parents, they explain that she got them out just in time, and that while not in imminent danger, she is in need of prayers, as bounties on her head have reached $20,000. During their prayer, the scene changes to a trail between Philadelphia and Maryland, where pitter-patters are in hot-pursuit of Harriet, who narrowly escapes capture.

Harriet returns to the plantation, hoping to rescue her sister, but Rachel is sick and dies in her arms. Though devastated, Harriet realizes that there is not even time sufficient to bury her sister. Instead, she takes one final group with her to the North. While on the trail, one tired runaway wants to turn back, she responds “I am Moses, the Liberator: You keep on going or die.”
