We hear you. We see you. We believe you.

To survive and thrive, survivors need support from their loved ones, community members, and social and legal systems. Unfortunately, their journey is ridden with questions full of blame and accusations directed at their clothing, their actions, and their existence. This pattern of victim-blaming prevents the survivors from speaking their truth. Instead, it enables the perpetrators in absence of accountability or consequences for their actions.

The first step in supporting survivors is believing them. We can all start by creating safe spaces that enable survivors to speak up about the abuse and violence without the fear of backlash or character assassination. This April, let's stand in solidarity with the survivors. Let’s uphold the physical and mental safety of survivors by holding perpetrators accountable for their actions. Let's end the culture of victim-blaming, and create a shift towards accountability.

Oral History Project

Maitri began in 1991. Looking back on it 30 years later, the beginning does not seem ordinary. Riddled with historical conflicts and continuing religious strife even among their various segments and/or countries, South Asian immigrants carry historical trauma and distrust across a diverse landscape. Our founders had to work through these complexities that also frame a survivor’s experience while also dealing with factors like patriarchy, generational subjugation, and so much of community ostracizing of the cause itself. To commemorate these 30 years of Maitri’s fascinating journey, we launched our Oral History Project. Read about it here in our blog and watch the space as we continue to build on it.
As we turned 30 this year, we celebrated by virtually connecting with our supporters, volunteers, former and present staff and board members, and our founders. Thank you everyone for joining us from all over the country to celebrate this milestone with us!

Presentations

Sonya Pelia (Maitri Board President) gave a TEDx talk at Saratoga High School and shared Maitri's journey and its role in bringing about a change in the South Asian community in Bay Area.

Nandini Ray (Manager, Outreach and Prevention) presented at Stanford 'Listen to The Silence' Conference about understanding Intimate Partner Violence from an immigrant lens. Ray also joined the API-GBV panel for addressing gender-based violence and spoke about the issues that teens from API communities face.

Zakia Afrin (Manager, Client Advocacy Program) and Jaya S (Manager, Housing & Economic Empowerment Program) gave a presentation at Cisco and educated the attendees about Domestic Violence.
Career readiness workshop

Maitri’s Economic Empowerment Program offered a 4-session Career Readiness workshop for our survivors. The activity-based Zoom workshop focused on getting participants ready to face their first interview.

Participant feedback:
“It helped me gain self-confidence in knowing how to present myself at a job interview and helped me realize some skills I have.”
“I really enjoyed this training program and found it very helpful. Otherwise, I would not feel very confident in going into an interview. I learned a lot of tips.”

In April, the EEP program is offering a 2-session 'Understanding Financial Security workshop’.

Community recognition

Councilmember Sylvia Arenas applauded Maitri's prevention work with community youth in San Jose City Council meeting. Maitri PSA was showcased commemorating Teen Dating Violence Awareness Month.
