John Baldessari

American, 1931-2020

“While so much early conceptual art tended toward the cold and cerebral, Mr. Baldessari’s was infused with a droll sense of humor. He employed a sort of Dada irony and sometimes colorful Pop Art splashes — blue was his favorite color — to rescue conceptual art from what he saw as its high-minded self-seriousness.”

Words play a central role in Gotham's return, and there might be no place better than the live theatre of a restaurant, which cannot be simulated on screen, to explore the import of our digital age.

With text figuring largely throughout Baldessari's body of work, his late-in-life Emoji Series is an inversion of the artist's relationship to language.

Referencing the book of Genesis and Rene Magritte's "The Son of a Man," the apple emoji was the most popular print from this series. The king of fruits, the apple itself is iconic and here, in Gotham's 12th Street-facing window, it unmistakably plays on our city's nickname while adding a green spin that references our commitment to sustainability.

According to Gemini's excellent press release, "The Emoji Series was inspired by Baldessari's interest in expressing language and communication through imagery. Emojis, increasingly used as a form of electronic communication [in lieu of words] fascinated him as a cross between glyph, image, pictograph, and icon. Their meanings can be as simple as the object actually represented, or host a complex, nuanced personal or cultural interpretation..."

Printed by Master Screenprinters Richard Kaz and Jeff McMane, the greatly enlarged transformation from the digital screen onto a silkscreen is not without a sense of irony, the transfer to the physical world, on paper, is the exact reverse of the way we usually view artwork in 2018."

One of Baldessari's last exhibitions, for the "Hands & Feet" series, the artists made selections from film images and newspaper sources, tightly cropping them to focus our attention on the hands that hold, grip, and gesture, conveying human intention and mood without any facial expression needed.

We at Gotham love the sense of Americana in this image, a bit of humorous contradiction as it is both dated and timeless, tacky and elegant.

Snarkitecture is a New York-based collaborative design practice established to investigate the boundaries between disciplines, primarily sculpture and architecture.

Its portmanteau name was inspired by Lewis Carroll's poem, "The Hunting of the Snark," which describes the "impossible voyage of an improbable crew to find an inconceivable creature."

In its first chapter on Gotham's walls, "Broken Mirrors" have bewitched diners and beautifully set the tone for our refreshed room as they anchor the eye from nearly every vantage point. We particularly love the scenes they reflect, making them a motion picture—works of ephemeral art—like food and drink.

The first Brazilian artists to exhibit at MOMA, The Sao Paulo-based studio is acknowledged internationally as pioneers of disruptive design, which led them to create a ground-breaking language in their field. Proudly rooted in Brazilian culture and traditions, their work carries universal values in its core, such as freedom and human dignity, through the search of our identity from life experiences. Their creative process raises everyday materials to nobility, bringing not only creativity to design but also Brazilian characteristics— the colors, the mixtures, the creative chaos—the triumph of simple solutions, in an artistic and poetic way.

“There’s an airlessness in a lot of the paintings that I love, a flattening of space. It’s as if the whole scene has been paused or a vacuum has sucked all the air out.”

—Danielle Orchard

With her star now risen, Danielle Orchard wryly nods to art historical forebears, such as Picasso and Matisse, making luscious, angular pseudo self-portraits of women caught up in romantic and mundane rituals. “They’re familiar rituals that look very serene,” Orchard says, “but when you’re a woman who has experienced them, you know that there’s usually a lot going on.”

For this sold-out series, the artist has hand embellished ten prints with new still-life elements rendered through oil pastel, gouache and Flashe.

"In the process of my work, what interests me most is painting in its most genuine form. I see a lot of power in colors and pictorial compositions; this attracts me a lot. The relationship with the people portrayed takes second place. As much as I seek to tell stories and imbue experiences or meanings in the scenes, I want to be recognized as a painter. That is why I use the dualism of abstraction and figuration in my work. But despite this, the models are also important. I try to build shared scenes of friendship, love, power, and complicity with them."

As for the role of social relationships, I look for the opposite of discrimination. I like the idea of warmth, love, togetherness, sex, and desire. I put all of this into my work. Individual characters are not sad. They're always in a position of power, striking an attitude, showing off, looking confident and powerful."

"In developing my own personal language of abstraction for the past 20 years, I continue to seek ways to find invention and liberation in painting. I make large scale, colorful, multi-layered canvases that lure the viewer into a world of complexity and chaos. I make paintings that I hope challenge and engage the viewer directly, as an overall complex viewing experience. My paintings are colorful, fluid, tough, and use a very practiced intuition that translates into paintings that have multiple reads and entry points. Each work tends to exist in its own universe with very specific rules and structure, allowing me to push the possibilities within abstraction."

Robert spoke about his process and the inspiring positivity at the heart of his depictions of Black family life and values, too often underrepresented throughout culture and media.

The talk was moderated by Gotham curator Emily Santangelo.
Stay tuned as Robert plans to return to Gotham for a follow-up conversation in June!

Jim Watt is an American artist and architect based in Asbury Park, New Jersey. Watt's paintings and drawings are an obsessive exploration of space, form and material, a context that marries his work as a practicing architect. At Princeton University, where Watt earned his Masters in Architecture, teachers Michael Graves and Enrique Miralles espoused the Renaissance notion that architects must paint, draw, and sculpt to fully realize their ideas.

Watt has a body of built buildings spanning North America, and his art is in private collections across North America and Europe.

We appreciate this jazz-loving Renaissance man for his art and his philanthropy. In the wake of COVID, Watt started 1000W, seeking to raise $100,000 for the jazz community, which has been especially hard hit during the Covid pandemic. $100 from the purchase of each 1000W painting will go directly to musicians in the jazz community. Born in Pakistan, Schahbaz studied Indo-Persian classical painting before coming to the United States in 2010.

Formally trained in the centuries-old tradition of Indo-Persian painting, Hiba Schahbaz works with imagery predominately developed and practiced by men, and recontextualizes it to embrace women's perspectives. She uses photographs of her body as visual references for works that echo the stylized figures and landscapes of Islamic art.

Featuring two women in an idyllic scene, Moon Dance imbues the composition and motifs of miniature painting with a distinct femininity that ushers the historical genre into the contemporary era. A few remain at artforchange.com

“It was a chance staging for the TV show Younger that filled Gotham with new art. For the episode we needed to turn our emptied restaurant back into Gotham as the world knew it. It was an eerie experience that breathed life into our shuttered room and placed art at the forefront of our re-creation. With an interest in sharing the work of established and emerging artists, we approached our longtime friends at Gemini G.E.L., who introduced us to curator Emily Santangelo. Emily helped us stage our "old room" for Younger then again for our redesigned room and November reopening.

Each piece in Gotham Gallery is not only visually arresting but a springboard for conversation, food for thought that turns art—as Jerry Saltz said of the work Jasper Johns—into a philosophical machine. Philosophy, the study of our condition and place in the world, are at the heart of our new Gotham, how together in creating a dining experience we can help to better our industry, our city, and our planet. Join us for a taste!

Art of the meal

ART adviser Emily Santangelo was tapped by the TV Land series "Younger" to complete the set for a scene at Gotham Bar & Grill, we hear. Her picks included works by famed artists Ed Ruscha, Sophie Calle, Christopher Le Brun and Jim Watt. But the selections were such a hit at the famed eatery that its new owner, Bret Csencsitz, has asked Santangelo to serve as curator for the soon-to-be revived restaurant. A source told us, "Art will be a rotating program for the space, most likely bi-annually." The upcoming Season 7 of "Younger," starring Sutton Foster and Hilary Duff, is reportedly its last.
