Context

Since a very long time in history, never have the responsibility, courage and audacity of enterprises been so much challenged. In an open market with now over 3 billion people living in a shutdown situation to fight the COVID 19 crisis, the patterns of working, learning and consuming have changed significantly in just a few weeks. Enterprises from all sizes and regions are facing shifts in product demand and supply chain interruptions. From a human, social and economic perspective, it is for too many becoming already an unbearable situation. But these are also unprecedented times where men and women in businesses, civil society and governments are translating their solidarity, entrepreneurship and resilience through all kinds of actions and collaborations in the best manner they can to care about others and navigate these difficult times. We want to express our unity with those who have found themselves in an uneasy situation and pay tribute to all those who are acting in one form or another. Together we should put care and well-being in all board rooms and policies, learn and inspire from best practice and be ready to bounce forward.

HR Managers are dealing with unprecedented workforces challenges. The ongoing coronavirus outbreak is accelerating the need to have digitally, future-proofed companies and upskilling employees is more urgent than ever. On 18 March, the European Commission has set up a Coronavirus Response Investment Initiative that EU member states can benefit from. This initiative aims to mobilise cohesion policy to flexibly respond to the rapidly emerging needs in the most exposed sectors, such as healthcare, SMEs and labour markets. Companies need to build resilience and integrate long term planning. In such a situation, the human skills in companies are an essential component of economic capital. Interpersonal management brings together a series of skills that are very important at present such as the ability to mobilise a group, to communicate easily or to resolve conflicts. Many large companies, especially those with high added value, have understood the vital importance of both individual and collective human skills. However, large and expensive training and development programmes do not always produce the desired results if the employee is not fully involved in the process. Employee retention in times of crisis will help to resume to normal as employees will be more motivated and their loyalty strengthened.
