The discussion of the moral issue was made more than a hundred years ago. On the morning of September 26, 1852, the Massachusetts legislature met in Boston to consider the question of slavery. The debate was intense, with abolitionists and slaveholders presenting their arguments. The debate continued for several hours, with abolitionists arguing that slavery was a moral evil that had to be ended, while slaveholders defended their right to own property. In the end, the legislature failed to reach a consensus, and the issue was deferred for another day.

The following day, the debate continued, with even more passionate speeches on both sides. The issue of slavery would continue to be a topic of debate for many years, and it would ultimately lead to the American Civil War.
