* Three colleagues, two languages, and an inspiring teacher

It is with regret that we announce the recent passing of three SSILA colleagues. Emory Sekaquaptewa, the first recipient of SSILA's Ken Hale Prize, died December 13, 2007, at the age of 79. Eloise Jelinek, retired professor of linguistics at the University of Arizona, died in Tucson on December 21, 2007, after a long illness. And Blair Rudes, Associate Professor of English at the University of North Carolina at Charlotte, died of a sudden heart attack on March 16, 2008.

It also saddens us to note the passing of Marie Smith, the last speaker of Eyak; of Alfred Chalepah, Jr., the last fluent speaker of Plains Apache; and of Irving "Hap" McCue, for 33 years Lecturer in Ojibwe Language and Culture at the University of Michigan in Ann Arbor.
Full obituaries will appear in the next (double) issue of the SSILA Newsletter.

* Project on (endangered) numeral systems

From Eugene S. L. Chan (eugenechans@hkbn.net) 14 March 2008:

Greetings from Hong Kong!

I am working with Bernard Comrie on documentation of the numeral systems of the world's languages, with special attention to endangered systems (i.e., where the traditional numeral systems of small languages are being replaced by those of dominant languages). I have set up a website, hosted by the Max Planck Institute for Evolutionary Anthropology in Leipzig, where I will share all the data in due course, to promote research on small languages and to raise awareness of the problem of endangered numeral systems:

http://lingweb.eva.mpg.de/numeral/

I am still looking for sources of data on a number of indigenous American languages. (There is a questionnaire at the website.)

Many thanks.

--Eugene S. L. Chan

* Translations of phrase needed for book cover

From Barbara W. Sommer (barb-sama@al.com) 9 March 2008:

I am one of three co-authors of the forthcoming book, "Making Many Voices Heard: An Indian Oral History Manual," to be released by Left Coast Press this fall. The manual begins with an overview of oral history, then covers the planning process, legal and ethical issues, equipment guidelines, interview preparation, the interview, processing and curating, and examples of uses. The manual has been many years in the making.

The authors and publishers would like to develop a graphic for the cover that uses the four words of the title ("Making Many Voices Heard") in a variety of indigenous languages. Using as many translations as we are given, graphic artists will write them out to fill a page, screen the graphic, and then print the title against the screened graphic of the "many voices."

Would anyone be able to help us with the translations? We will credit all translations and translators.
* Can anyone identify this language?

From Carl Masthay (cmasthay@juno.com) 25 Feb 2008:

Can anyone identify the language and possible meaning for the following sentence or phrase (from Sandy Glasteter)?

shunota hi donuta hi shiska.

The words that come after it, and are possibly its translation, are "The one who waits. The one who's the one who will be."

The phrase came in an e-mail message from the Eastern Band of Cherokee, but it is apparently not Cherokee (unless it is garbled). Nor is it Lakota. Neither is it Choctaw or any Algonquian, Iroquoian, or Athabascan language.

The context is lacking. No further provenience for context is possible.

The translation (if that's what it is) sounds like a woman expecting a child or one who expects a change for the better.

Anyone have an idea?

--Carl Masthay (for Sandy Glasteter)

* Link demonstrated between Na-Dene and Yeniseic

From Andrea Berez (andrea.berez@gmail.com) 2 March 2008:

[Attached below is a summary by Johanna Nichols of the highly successful Dene-Yeneseic Symposium, held at the end of February in Fairbanks and Anchorage. Other materials relating to the symposium are available on the eRes website at the University of Alaska library:

New items will be added periodically.]

A long-sought connection between Siberian and North American language families has been demonstrated by linguists from Washington and Alaska.

Prof. Edward Vajda of Western Washington University (Bellingham), a specialist on the Ket language isolate spoken by a shrinking number of elders living along the Yenisei River of central Siberia, combining ten years of library and field work on Ket and relying on the earlier work of Heinrich Werner on the now-extinct relatives of Ket, has clarified the dauntingly complex morphology and phonology of Ket and its Yeniseic congeneres. At a symposium held Feb. 26-27 at the University of Alaska, Fairbanks and a panel that took place Feb. 29 at the Alaska Anthropological Association annual meeting in Anchorage, Vajda showed that the abstract forms of lexical and grammatical morphemes and the rules of composition of the Ket verb find systematic and numerous parallels in the Na-Dene protolanguage reconstructed to account for the modern Tlingit and Eyak languages and the Athabaskan language family (whose daughters include Gwich'in, Koyukon, Dena'ina and others of Alaska, Hupa of California, and Navajo of the U.S. Southwest). The comparison was made possible by recent advances in the analysis of Tlingit phonology and Tlingit-Athabaskan-Eyak presented at the same symposium by Prof. Jeffrey Leer of the University of Alaska, Fairbanks, and by earlier work by Prof. Michael Krauss, also of UAF, on the now-extinct Eyak language and on comparative Athabaskan, as well as work on Athabaskan lexicography and verb stem analysis carried out by the symposium organizer, Prof. James Kari of UAF.

Working independently, Vajda and the Alaska linguists have arrived at abstract stem shapes and ancestral word-forms too numerous and displaying too many idiosyncratic parallels to be explained by anything other than common descent. The comparison also shows conclusively that Haida, sometimes associated with Na-Dene, is not related.

The distance from Yeniseic territory in Siberia to that of the most distant Athabaskan languages in the American Southwest is the greatest overland distance covered by any known language whose spread was not facilitated by wheeled transport or sails. Prof. Ben Potter of UAF, an archaeologist, reviewed the postglacial prehistory of Beringia and speculated that the Na-Dene speakers may descend from some of the earliest colonizers of the Americas, who eventually created the successful and long-lived Northern Archaic tool tradition that dominated interior and northern Alaska almost until historical times.

Vajda's work has been well vetted. In addition to Na-Dene specialists Krauss, Leer, and Kari, who have reacted favorably, the symposium was also attended by historical linguists Prof. Eric P. Hamp of the University of Chicago and Prof. Johanna Nichols of the University of California, Berkeley, both of whom announced their support for the proposed relationship, and by Bernard Comrie, Director of the Linguistics Department, Max Planck Institute for Evolutionary Anthropology, Leipzig and professor at UC Santa Barbara, who endorsed Vajda's methods. Athabaskanist Prof. Victor Golla of Humboldt State University, Eurasianist Prof. Michael Fortescue of the University of Copenhagen, Yeniseicist Dr. Heinrich Werner of Bonn (formerly of Taganrog University, Russia), and Prof. Nicholas Evans (Australian National University) read the draft of Vajda's report and reacted favorably.

* One-year lecturer position at Rice University

From Suzanne Kemmer (kemmer@rice.edu) 24 March 2008:

Pending funding approval, the Department of Linguistics at Rice University (Houston, Texas) is now accepting applications for a one-year lecturer position. Deadline for receipt of applications is April 15, 2008.

Responsibilities of the position include teaching historical linguistics, a two-semester field methods sequence, and a fourth course to be determined by mutual agreement. Ph.D. required by time of appointment, July 1, 2008.

We especially welcome applications from researchers who share the department's interest in approaching language from a usage-based perspective with solid empirical grounding in primary data, especially approaches of a cognitive, social-interactional, and/or functional nature. Experience in fieldwork and language documentation/revitalization is also desirable.

See also our departmental web site at http://ling.rice.edu.

Application materials include: cover letter, CV, teaching statement, sample of written work, and three letters of reference. Past teaching evaluations and/or information about course topics the applicant could teach are also welcome but not required at this time.

Rice University is committed to affirmative action and equal opportunity in education and employment. Rice does not discriminate on the basis of race, color, religion, sex, sexual orientation, national or ethnic origin, age, disability or veteran status. Rice University is an Equal Opportunity/Affirmative Action Employer.

Address for applications:

Further questions contact Dept. Coordinator Rita Riley (rriley@rice.edu).

264.4 Upcoming Meetings

* The Swadesh Centenary Conference (Leipzig, Jan. 16-18, 2009)

From Anthony Grant (Granta@edgehill.ac.uk) 12 March 2008:

A conference celebrating the 100th year birthday of Morris Swadesh (1909-1967) is being planned for next January in Leipzig. Organized by Søren Wichmann (MPI for Evolutionary Anthropology & Leiden) and Anthony Grant (Edge Hill) the conference is intended primarily to bring together... scholars working on cutting-edge methods in historical linguistics and, secondarily, to assess Swadesh’s work and influence.

Swadesh made outstanding contributions in a number of linguistic fields, publishing over 200 books, articles and reviews. One of the pioneers of phonemic theory and of the methodical study of seriously endangered languages, he worked on dozens of languages of North and Central America and West Africa, contributed to the study of English phonology and to efficient ways of teaching languages to military personnel and civilians, and helped promote the cause of indigenous Mexican and other Native American languages to politicians and laymen alike. He is most widely known for his interests in historical relations between language families across the world, and on quantitative historical linguistic techniques (glottochronology and especially lexicostatistics) using as data source diagnostic vocabularies which have become known as "Swadesh lists".

Despite much bad press, lexicostatistics and glottochronology have lived on, seen various developments, and have been applied to languages around the globe. Moreover, diagnostic wordlists from perhaps close to a third of the world's languages have accumulated in the literature or on the internet, providing a unique resource for the investigation of the lexical behavior of languages in areal and genealogical perspectives.

Invited speakers will include: Mark Pagel (U Reading), Tandy Warnow (U Texas at Austin), and Eric W. Holman (UCLA).

We invite papers applying or discussing quantitatively oriented methods in historical linguistics, papers on the systematic investigation of languages and prehistory, and papers relating to Swadesh’s work. We expect to publish a book with a selection of the contributions.

Please send your anonymous 250-500 word abstract to <wichmann@eva.mpg.de>. The deadline for abstract submission is Sept. 30, 2008. The date of notification of acceptance is Oct. 15, 2008.

Dates and venue for the conference: Max Planck Institute for Evolutionary Anthropology, Leipzig, Jan 16-18, 2009.

For further information contact either Anthony Grant (Granta@edgehill.ac.uk) or Søren Wichmann (wichmann@eva.mpg.de).

* Liljeblad Endowment grants in Great Basin ethnography and linguistics

From Catherine S Fowler (csfowler@unr.edu) 3 March 2008:

The Sven and Astrid Liljeblad Endowment Fund announces the availability of grants for 2008-09 to support scholarly research (including fieldwork, oral history, cultural heritage programs, curriculum development and publication help) in Native American ethnography, linguistics, folklore and related subjects with emphasis on the Great Basin region of North America. Special consideration will be given to projects that further the work of Sven Liljeblad in Native American languages and oral tradition.

University faculty, graduate students, or other persons with appropriate qualifications are eligible to apply for grants to projects which will take place between July 1, 2008 and July 1, 2009. Native American scholars and groups are urged to apply.

Four copies of the application must be submitted by May 1, 2008, and should include the following:

1. A statement of no more than five pages describing the scope and purpose of the project.

2. A schedule outlining the order of tasks to be accomplished, and the anticipated dates of completion and submission of a final report summarizing the project results.

3. An itemized budget for expenditures of the funds requested.

4. A brief resume of the applicant’s educational and work experience with particular reference to attributes relevant to project requirements.

Since funds are limited, requests for research equipment must be minimal. Although small allocations for consultant fees or honoraria will be considered, based upon justification, salaries will not be funded. Projects are usually funded at $5,000 or less, but requests for larger amounts may be considered.

Applications must be made in writing to:

    The Sven and Astrid Liljeblad Endowment Committee
c/o Heather Hardy, Dean
College of Liberal Arts/0086
University of Nevada, Reno
Reno, NV 89557-0086

For phone inquiries, please call Catherine Fowler at (775) 853-3471.

Complete applications must be received by May 1, 2008.
