Book Review

This book describes the most notorious crimes and the criminals who committed them in early America. Counterfeiters, pirates, murderers, and other offenders are described. There is an explanation of how prosecution, sentencing and punishment evolved in colonial America. Sentences and punishments were often public events where the accused were held up as examples of what happens to people who violate the law. Public execution (hanging) for capital crimes, like murder, were well attended much as contemporary people would attend a rock concert or football game. Crimes against property were punished with practices intended to subject the offender to public ridicule and physical abuse, whipping or being locked into stocks. It’s amazing that at a time without wire or radio communication, the tracking of criminals and their apprehension could be so efficient. Strangers in a community were noticed. People who saw something would say something. One wonders how many innocents were suspected without cause and apprehended just because they were new in the neighborhood and not accompanied by family. One has to hope that identifying criminals was more accurate than has been the case in recent time.

Owen Connally, John Flynn’s son-in-law, was a prominent attorney in Troy and Lansingburgh for many years. He did legal work for the brush business and was a Flynn family attorney.

Orville and Andrew Flynn became important players in the production end of the brush factory after their father’s death in 1917. It is said that much of the Flynn Brothers brush drawing continued to be done by hand long after their competitors had employed drawing machines. As a result their productivity lagged behind competitors and was complicated by a shortage of hog bristle during and following World War I. The business declined into the 1920’s.

William Flynn, the fifth son of James and Ann Flynn, was a professional baseball player in the 1870’s. He was nicknamed “Clipper” Flynn and played for the White Stockings, forerunner of the Chicago White Sox. Locally he played for the Troy Haymakers and also for the Washington (DC) Olympics. He was a first baseman and a right fielder. William and his wife Bridget married after his stint as a baseball player and had children Lucy, William Jr., John, George A. and Anna T. Flynn. Except for the few years he was a professional baseball player, William and his family lived in Lansingburgh. He died in the Burgh in 1881.

Jr. Their six daughters were Ella, Anna, Livinia Elizabeth, Mary, Ester and Loretta. William Michael Joseph Flynn lived his adult life in New York City and New Jersey. He was a police officer in New York City and retired in Monmouth County, NJ. He and his wife Emma had one son, William Jr. Andrew A. Flynn died in 1931. Mary died in 1930.

The graves of most of the Flynn family who lived locally are in St. John’s Cemetery on Cemetery Road in Lansingburgh.
504–506 Second Avenue was first owned in 1872 by John Ames, a wealthy brush maker. It was bought in 1876 by Dr. Allison Hull who had his home and office here and built the carriage house behind the home on 113th Street. In 1920, the house was bought by the Bethesda House for homeless women. Today it is a residential home owned by Unity House.

Kathleen DeRosa and Jim Norton have collaborated to produce a book on Lansingburgh titled, A View of Lansingburgh, Then and Now.
