Dear Friends,

He says “You’re a cracked shell.” I say, “I am still keeping my shape.”

So writes Telling Room author Simona Ickia Ngaullo in “Cracked Shell,” a poem she wrote in the Young Writers & Leaders program and published in Shadowboxing, a book dedicated to what we lost and what we found this past year.

Like the speaker in Simona’s poem, many of us have learned to see what’s holding us together through the cracks. In fact, we spent the year exploring what it meant to have The Telling Room cracked by COVID and its many crises while still maintaining our shape. What would our afterschool programs feel like outside of our cozy Commercial Street space, with its lime green cabinets and well-worn chairs? We wondered if we would be able to make and maintain connections with students far and wide as we reimagined our operations and events. Were engagement and creativity still possible in an online learning environment?

The virtual world quickly became our space.

We forged connections and broadened our reach. Our staff invented brand new statewide digital programming to connect students in isolated areas of Maine. Our Ambassadors and alums hosted Instagram Live Open Mic Nights, and we held energized student readings over Zoom. These were all such successes that we sometimes even forgot that we were virtual. Sometimes.

In the spring of 2021, we ventured back into a few classrooms, both virtually and in-person. We dusted off our tables and brought our students safely back into our space on Commercial Street. By the summer, The Telling Room studio was abuzz once more with staff and young authors with pens in hand!

By prioritizing community — and community-building — The Telling Room kept and strengthened our dedication to youth empowerment. We maintained hope and held space for one another, even though that space might have looked and felt a little different. Our students continued to write, many of them processing the dual pandemics of COVID and racism. We had a special visit from former president and acclaimed author Barack Obama. And inaugural poet Amanda Gorman wrote the introduction to our best-selling student poetry anthology, A New Land, not just shining a light on youth voices across the country, but embodying what we see young writers doing at The Telling Room each and every day: finding their voices and raising them up to reshape our communities for the better.

Because of all of you — students, readers, teachers, parents, guardians, friends, supporters, partners, volunteers, the list is long — we’ve been able to share youth stories throughout the year. We continue to empower and amplify youth voices that define The Telling Room and our community.

Thank you for helping us navigate these most challenging times. Your support has been a life force for Telling Room students and staff. We hope you’ll see in this report how powerful our voices can be when we join together, how through this year we’ve kept our shape, and how we are emerging even stronger than before.

With hope and gratitude,

Celine Kuhn,

At The Telling Room, we empower youth through writing and share their voices with the world. As a literary arts education organization focused on young writers ages 6 to 18, we seek to build confidence, strengthen literacy skills, and provide real audiences for our students. We believe that the power of creative expression can change our communities and prepare our youth for success both now and in the future.

“Anybody who enters the Telling Room’s doors knows that they have a place in the world.”

— Amanda Dettmann, Telling Room Author, Alum, and Ambassador
In March of 2020, I had to write the hardest email of my eight-year tenure at The Telling Room. Here’s an excerpt of what I said to our teaching artists:

I don’t think anyone knows exactly what the future holds. I can’t promise that this hiatus is only two weeks, nor can I make any guarantees about programs scheduled for this spring. I just know that we have to start here, for the health and safety of everyone in our community.

I like to reflect on that email periodically. Virtual programming went well at The Telling Room — in fact, we decided we’re going to keep one program virtual and make at least one other hybrid! The biggest beneficiaries of our remote programming were young people who live beyond the Portland area. And when we say beyond the Portland area, we’re talking about every county in Maine. For the first time, we had students who live more than a four-hour drive away from our studio attending weekly programs.

Like many places, the story we’re telling of the pandemic is one of resilience, resourcefulness, and gratitude. Resilience because we’ve made the most of virtual learning, going from knowing absolutely nothing in March 2020 to giving advice on best practices in professional development workshops in June 2021. Resourcefulness because we started a new virtual program and in the process made connections around the state that will serve us, Maine’s youth, and our community in the future. Gratitude because we’ve received tremendous support from all our stakeholders throughout, and had the good fortune of doing work — writing — that translates reasonably well to a virtual environment. All you need is a blank page, something to write with, and a little imagination to get started.

— Nick Whiston
Program Director
Despite the pandemic’s disruptions to our usual residency calendar, we successfully ran our first two virtual residencies ever, both with long-time educational partners. At Shapleigh School in Kittery, we led a personal narrative residency for a 6 - 8th grade group and two 4th - 5th grade groups. Though it created long days online for our teaching artists and students alike, the writers were fired up and published a beautiful chapbook, Excited to Look Around. The book is 164 pages of short fiction featuring 134 authors, as well as dragons, playgrounds, and the worst-tasting food ever.

At Oceanside Middle School, teacher Catherine Sally was determined to have The Telling Room back after her March 2020 residency was canceled after just one day due to COVID. Students wedged themselves into spaces all over the school and at home to log in and participate, connecting with classmates learning remotely. We celebrated the launch of their chapbook, Here We Are Today, outdoors in a garden planted by the students, whose writing had grown alongside the vegetable patch.
With some of the technology wrinkles of spring 2020 ironed out, our Mast Landing virtual poetry workshop was a smooth success. To accommodate hybrid schedules and students attending at home, we split the usual group into two smaller cohorts. Throughout, we witnessed students passionate about writing develop their craft alongside reluctant writers, and all produced work they could be proud of. Although our six meetings were virtual, we were excited to be able to gather socially distanced and masked in the elementary school’s cafeteria for a heartening final reading.

MAST LANDING SCHOOL: Freeport

One of the highlights of our year is collaborating with the 4th and 5th grade teachers at Marcia Buker Elementary School in Richmond. After a long hiatus from inviting outside groups to come in, we jumped at the opportunity to visit as soon as the doors reopened to visitors in spring of 2021. Using our theme of “Mystery,” we got kids outside investigating mysterious places and inanimate object characters around the school grounds. The two mystery poems they wrote were wonderful, but the most fun thing was the shared delight of being back in the classroom with students — and having a blast writing and sharing in community.

MARCIA BUKER ELEMENTARY: Richmond

Another highlight of our long-awaited return to schools was a college essay workshop in Cape Elizabeth, and it was worth the wait. Through the hybrid format, we were able to spend multiple sessions with each student teasing out potential topics and writing. We can’t wait to check in with them this fall to see how their essays have been coming along!
After many months of isolation, we joyfully (and safely!) reopened our doors in April of 2020 to bring one of our most in-demand programs back from hiatus — Writers Block! For the first time in over a year, we welcomed students into our space to write and connect in-person in a low-pressure, fun, creative way. Two cohorts grouped by age (students 9-12 and 13-18) joined us in a supportive environment to meet new friends and engage in writing through choose-your-own prompts suitable for multiple genres and levels. A diverse group joined us from Kittery, Westbrook, Cape Elizabeth, Cumberland, Portland, and South Portland, and we were so glad to hear the sound of pencils scratching on paper once more!
In summer of 2020, we launched SWARM! (Student Writers And Readers Meet!) to connect students from all across Maine virtually during the pandemic. It was our first foray into virtual teaching, and a big success! Our first SWARM! was led by four teaching artists and offered a platform for students to write and publish a piece about their experiences during this unprecedented time. After the first four ‘hives’ met and were published in their chapbook, we’ve offered this program every semester since, broadening our focus to include other genres and themes so students can submit their writing to our annual anthology. We will continue to offer SWARM! moving forward so that youth living anywhere in Maine have a way to connect with The Telling Room and write with one another.

Writing a book in a year is a tall order — writing a book in a pandemic year is a monumental feat! In a time when many writers struggled to put words on the page, our four Young Emerging Authors students prevailed against the challenges COVID presented. Each student grew as a writer, and was pushed to think more deeply about their prose (we had four novels this year!), story structure, and audience. Through weekly Zoom sessions, we shared writing with each other and mentors, building community amongst our cohort. The mentorship component was paramount, and because of Zoom, mentors were able to join us from near and far. Our meetings became a bright spot for students during a year of remote learning and limited in-person interaction.
We were able to meet in-person for the first time on a glorious spring day in April, and this summer we celebrated the launch of this year's books, including a biting social satire, a novel in vignettes, a tender family drama, and an imaginative LGBTQ+ coming-of-age story. This intimate, in-person celebration in our Commercial Street studio space was a festive and validating way to end an isolated year. We congratulate Leigh, Lerman, Maya, and Sofie for all that they accomplished.
Young Writers & Leaders (YWL) began in July 2020, when we held a virtual one-week intensive, serving eight students who then submitted their work to two of our online publications, “Voice of a Pride” and “Stories.” In October 2020, we began our nine-month program virtually, meeting with two cohorts of sixteen students who represented seven high schools in Greater Portland and eleven different nations, including Angola, Burundi, Congo, Ethiopia, Gabon, Iraq, Jordan, Kurdistan, Rwanda, Somalia, and Sudan.

Students began to write together, exploring their cultural identity and various literary genres, composing original poems and personal narratives with the help of their individual volunteer writing coaches, four of whom were YWL alums themselves! They had engaging visits from guest writers, and we celebrated their writing twice for virtual audiences, in collaboration with the Portland Public Library — sharing their words with 165 people in all. Students concluded the year by writing short fiction pieces inspired by portraits by fine art photographer Séan Alonzo Harris.

One of the highlights of our year with the YWL students was the opportunity to have a special conversation with acclaimed author and renowned world leader, President Barack Obama. Ahead of his visit, Crown Publishing sent a free copy of his presidential memoir, A Promised Land, to every student enrolled in the program and made the audiobook available as well. The 44th President of the United States conversed over Zoom with our students, and shared insights on writing, leadership, what’s on his favorite playlist, and the experience of growing up between cultures. He encouraged the students to continue to seek mentorship and education, and to continue writing beyond this program, leaving them inspired.

In June, we gathered at Thompson’s Point for a joyous launch of their chapbook, No Time for Rehearsing, and students were able to meet each other and their writing mentors in-person — many for the very first time! Friendship, warmth, and hope was in the air that sunny afternoon, and these students continue to inspire through their writing and leadership, joining the incredible family of YWL alumni in our community.
STUDENTS REFLECT ON SPEAKING WITH BARACK OBAMA

“...all of you are voices that I can’t wait to hear.”
— Barack Obama, 44th President of the United States

“You can’t change the world by yourself. You need other people trying to do the same thing as you to make it happen.”
— Simona Ickia Ngaullo, South Portland High School Senior

“I’m not in this [writing] alone. I’m going to get better with time. You just have to keep going.”
— Alia Usanase, Deering High School Junior

“He was in our shoes at one time. Your path isn’t always clear, and look at him, he became president, and he’s here talking to us. It gave me inspiration . . . anything is possible and he made that very clear.”
— Khalil Kilani, Waynflete Senior
Nine students wrote with us in the fall as we fell in love with poetry and spoken word. Three poets (all current or former Telling Room mentors, staff, and/or Ambassadors), Nyamuon Nguany Machar (Moon), Amanda Dettmann, and Samaa Abdurraqib, joined us as guest artists and inspired our students by sharing writing and performance tips. The semester culminated in a Zoom performance, open to the public, to celebrate these dedicated young authors.

Spring welcomed new students to our program with different writing goals and needs. Youth across Maine were feeling the effects of an extended year of remote learning, lockdowns, and virtual programming, and many craved a less structured creative space where they could feel supported and safe. Poets Myles Bullen and Maya Williams, whose work is often steeped in topics of mental health and identity, joined us as guest artists, and we found inspiration from other youth writers in A New Land. We pivoted to more collaborative writing exercises like drafting group poems, and each participant was floored by the enchanting final product. As this young program continues to grow and evolve, we were proud of how our flexible staff and students pivoted to meet the moment during a challenging year.
In the fall semester of Publishing Workshop, seven students and one Telling Room alum worked virtually with the program leads, Molly McGrath and Clare LaVergne, to brainstorm innovative marketing ideas for The Telling Room’s newly published collection of best-of youth poetry, A New Land. We looked at marketing trends in the U.S. publishing world and developed strategies that eventually became part of the comprehensive promotional plans for A New Land, in tandem with the 25th anniversary of National Poetry Month.

In the spring semester, three students and two Telling Room alumni worked with the program leads to serve as editors of The Telling Room’s annual anthology of student writing, which centered on the theme of “Lost and Found” this year. We flexed our typically very interactive process of reading and discussing submissions, weighing in on cover design decisions, and planning a launch celebration in a virtual format. Thirty student voices spanning Telling Room programs, residencies, and workshops, are collected in this new book, including the three Publishing Workshop students, along with an introduction collaboratively written by program participants and a cover designed by Publishing Workshop participant, Telling Room author and Ambassador Alicia Brillant.

After losing the chance to work together in The Telling Room’s physical studio, in June we found our connection with each other once more as twenty-two authors, their families, and friends gathered with us on Portland’s Eastern Promenade to celebrate the launch of Shadowboxing. Nearly all of the authors came up to take the mic and read from their selections in the book and signed each other’s copies, while two of our authors, all-star alumni from Publishing Workshop, emceed the event. This collection brings together writing from all of our programs and the young authors who came together to produce published work stayed the course throughout the pandemic. We couldn’t imagine a higher note to end the year on!
We are indeed living in “a new land,” a prophetic title that the poets surely weren’t imagining when they wrote courageously about their identities, climate change, immigration experiences, and more, in A New Land. Yet this year, despite the obstacles, we worked with young people who showed up to write and to be published, turning them from writers into authors of a whole new shelf of gorgeous books. And in our new landscape, we faced the challenge of meeting our writers, editors, and designers virtually, reimagining what a book launch could be and how far our authors’ visits to classrooms could go.

From the editorial ideas bouncing from home screens into each other’s heads during virtual sessions of Publishing Workshop to the beautifully designed, brand new books mailed safely to readers, youth publishing persisted. As part of our mission “to share youth voices with the world,” it was heartening to see that people still bought and read books authored by youth, and more important than ever for these youth who saw each other only on screens to be published in a tangible object that marked their accomplishment.

This was a banner year for many of our authors who enjoyed being in print and were celebrated widely in their communities, raising the profile of Telling Room books to a statewide audience through broader outreach to educators across the state, bolder partnerships with the Maine Department of Education, Maine Humanities Council, and the Governor’s Office — taking our marketing efforts to new heights.

We are excited to see this next group of authors visit even more classrooms and libraries, and represent youth publishing at more readings and events in this next year. Be sure to stock up on Telling Room books for your shelves on our website, grab a copy from your local library, or order from an independent bookstore near you!

— Molly McGrath
Publications Director
Featuring 30 poems by Telling Room authors and an introduction by the incandescent Amanda Gorman, A New Land was released in November of 2020 and celebrated in April of 2021 in conjunction with the 25th anniversary of National Poetry Month.

A New Land was mailed to every single high school in Maine, and was a hit with each one! It was an incomparable joy to get to work closely with the poets in the book, many of whom came back as engaged alumni to create an educator toolkit for teachers of writing prompts, videos, and audio resources to accompany the book, which received endorsements from the Maine Department of Education, Governor Janet T. Mills, Maine Humanities Council, Indigo Arts Alliance, Maine Writers & Publishers Alliance, and The Greater Portland Immigrant Welcome Center.

The poets in A New Land hit the airwaves through a podcast aired as a special broadcast on Maine Public Radio and co-created with Maine’s Poet Laureate Stuart Kestenbaum, who sat down with our poets last summer at The Telling Room as they read their work aloud and discussed the themes and inspiration behind their words. This series was generously made possible by the Academy of American Poets with funds from the Andrew W. Mellon Foundation.

“I find it ridiculous when poets are automatically waved aside as ‘aspiring’ or ‘emerging’ due to their age. If I ever doubted my conviction, this collection just further verifies it.”

— Presidential Inaugural Poet Amanda Gorman from her introduction to A New Land
2021 FOUNDERS PRIZE

Excerpt from “Samosa Story” by Leaticia Hannah, Young Writers & Leaders
Winner of the 2021 Founders Prize

The Founders Prize is awarded annually by the three founders of The Telling Room: Susan Conley, Sara Corbett, and Michael Paterniti, to the author of the best piece of writing to come out of a Telling Room program.

When I was five years old, I was really close to my grandparents. We lived together with the rest of my family in Mwene Ditu, a big city in the Democratic Republic of Congo. I was supposed to help my grandma on small things around the house, like going to buy bread or milk or anything she needed for cooking. This allowed me to leave our family’s compound and walk on the street, which young children normally weren’t supposed to do, according to my grandpa’s rules. I liked having the responsibility. But only when I wasn’t already busy with my toys or my friends. Sometimes, my grandma would ask me to buy something for her, and I would refuse because I was more interested in playing with my friends. And if she really insisted, then I would start crying. And my grandmother would smile at me and say, “Even if you are crying, you are still going forward.”

I didn’t realize how important those words would become in my life. Going forward would always matter.

Leaticia Hannah was born in the Democratic Republic of Congo, and she grew up in Kinshasa. As a teenager, she moved to Luanda, Angola, where she went to the French school. Now she’s a senior at Deering High School in Portland, Maine. Leaticia is also the oldest sister in her family and an adventurous traveler. Her goal is to go as far with her education as she can, and she dreams of being a lawyer and an author so she can speak for people who don’t have a voice.
SUMMER CAMPS

Youth from all over the state joined us for a mix of virtual and in-person camps at The Telling Room in the summers of 2020 and 2021! What we saw in these summertime writing and publishing experiences was humbling and energizing as youth throughout Maine picked up their pencils, pens, laptops, and iPads and wrote with us no matter where they were, from their homes to a city farmer’s market to a farm in the countryside.

We heard time and time again that this was by far the most challenging academic year that teachers of all experience levels had faced. To support our schools and students, we strove to collaborate in creative new ways throughout the year with one of our most vital partners — our educators.

Program Director Nick Whiston and Lead Teacher Marjolaine Whittlesey teamed up with the Maine Department of Education on their initiative, Maine Online Opportunities for Sustained Education (MOOSE). These online learning modules are aligned with the Maine Learning Results, project-based and student-centered, free, and open to all for use. Catch Telling Room student writing and our teaching philosophy in several units, including the The Poet Tree, A Whole New World: Constructed Language and Worldbuilding, and Cultural Connections: Understanding Elements that Contribute to Cultural Identity modules.

Alongside our National Poetry Month campaign to send A New Land to each high school in Maine with tools for educators, we hosted two virtual statewide workshops in the spring for teachers across the state exploring how to teach poetry and short story writing. Students and alumni joined us to share their work, experiences, and classroom tips from those now teaching themselves. Educators were particularly curious about how to support students through constructive feedback and the revision process, and excited to learn different ways to approach writing when the empty page looms large. These short sessions were a wonderful way to connect with educators in our state and build connections that led to author classroom visits, curriculum collaborations, and more!

In June we shifted our Summer Institute for Educators to a virtual setting and met with twelve teachers and community members from across the country to share The Telling Room’s approach to empowering students through writing. This intensive three day workshop left our group feeling uplifted, inspired, and well-equipped to support youth through the challenges ahead.

In 2020, we reimagined our Ambassador program to engage Telling Room program alumni to advise and engage on strategic organizational decision-making opportunities across The Telling Room, ranging from programming, publications, development, and curriculum design. Our five Ambassadors, Edna Thecla Akimana, Alicia Brillant, Amanda Dettmann, Rachel Iradukunda, and Ladislas Nzeyimana, shone throughout the community in so many different ways!

From creating and hosting presentations with community members as Telling Room alumni and authors to celebrating National Poetry Month at Tandem Coffee Roasters through an Instagram takeover, and as key members of our Executive Director search Hiring Committee, these alumni were essential and innovative envoys of The Telling Room’s mission, values, and students. We are so grateful to them for bringing their time, creativity, and enthusiasm to the following events and partnerships:

SHOW & TELL: A LITERARY SPECTACULAR

Necessity drove us to new heights of creativity as we re-imagined our signature literary variety show to be a virtual event! Fearless filmmaker and director Sean Mewshaw adapted one of our largest performances of the year into an intimate evening at Portland’s historic State Theatre that Telling Room community members could tune into from home. We were joined by the talents of Lady Lamb, authors Phuc Tran and Kelly Corrigan, and the evening was joyfully emceed by two Telling Room alums — Amanda Dettmann and Salim Salim. Poems by A New Land authors Lulu Rasor, Benedita Zalabantu, and Siri Pierce came to life through video as our community rallied around The Telling Room’s mission and students in a whole new — and highly successful — way!
