Within the context of conservation and resource management, the principles of equity and environmental justice ensure that every person - regardless of race, ethnicity, nationality, religion, sexual orientation, U.S. Armed Forces veteran status, or other protected characteristics – receive consistent, uninhibited, and equal opportunity and access to programs, funding, and other benefits derived from land stewardship efforts. The Arizona Association of Conservation Districts (AACD) strongly believes that all Arizonans share the responsibility to protect and conserve natural resources for the benefit of future generations. The AACD holds that traditionally underserved groups provide new, valuable perspectives to statewide conservation efforts, and the AACD is committed to proactively engaging with these underserved groups to ensure that these perspectives are added, and not ignored, in the prevailing discourse. Through targeted outreach programs, DEI-focused Board succession procedures, and an increased emphasis on engaging with producers and contractors from historically underserved groups, the AACD is committed to increasing diversity throughout the entire conservation process pipeline, from funding application and planning to implementation.
