This year, Repro Shabbat gives us not only the chance to gather and learn about what Judaism says about abortion, but also an opportunity to make space for, and to listen to, those most impacted by abortion bans.

In a post-Dobbs world, we are more aware than ever of the importance of individual narratives in building the movement for reproductive liberation. By hearing personal stories, we actively destigmatize abortion and affirm the humanity of those who have them.

That is why we are introducing, for the first time ever, a guide to planning and facilitating a storytelling program in your community. This resource was created with the help of the clergy team at Congregation Beth Elohim in Brooklyn, NY, as well as the organizations WeTestify and Jewish Women’s Archive. We have included a basic script and best practices for facilitators, tips for those who want to share, and sample language to use for publicity and outreach. As with everything in our #ReproShabbat toolkit, we encourage you to use what works for you and your community. Please feel free to tweak, edit, or adapt this resource to best suit your needs, and as always, please reach out to us (action@ncjw.org) if you need help.

Best Practices

As you begin to plan your program, we hope that you keep the following guiding principles in mind: a safe place to be vulnerable, various modes of connection, and the weight of ritual.

A safe place to be vulnerable

People with abortion stories often do not share their experiences because of social stigma and culturally-imposed shame. It is the role of spiritual leaders to break down the walls that stigma builds by setting the tone and expectations, and creating an environment conducive to emotional sharing. It’s important to speak about abortion in a straightforward and matter-of-fact way (including saying the word!) as a healthcare procedure; exhibiting discomfort or going out of the way to find euphemisms continues to perpetuate stigma. Please also review our Language Best Practices before getting started in order to steer clear of other possible pitfalls and find other ways to be as accepting and inclusive as possible.

People get abortions for a lot of reasons, in a lot of contexts. They do not need to justify their reasons to anyone. The value of kavod habriot, human dignity, involves honoring people's autonomous agency and ability to determine their own destiny. Sometimes abortions are difficult decisions—but sometimes they aren't. And there is no one way to feel about one's abortion. For some, their abortion may be a joyful or liberating experience; for others it may be confusing, sad, other things, or a mix of feelings. Be sure not to presume, and to include a range of narratives in your program for the sake of sensitivity and inclusivity.

Various modes of engagement

Just as there is no universal emotional experience after an abortion, you will likely encounter a range of comfort levels with regards to story sharing. Some people may feel comfortable sharing their story publicly, while others may prefer to share anonymously. Be sure to create a space that encourages people to connect on their own terms.

The weight of ritual

While it may seem tempting to plan an event that stands on its own, we encourage you to consider how Jewish rituals can add meaning or ground your program in our tradition. You may consider including abortion storytelling in place of the sermon during services, or performing Havdalah before telling stories. By incorporating ritual into your storytelling program, the act of sharing gains religious and spiritual significance that can provide comfort to the storytellers, as well as heightened religious context for those listening.

Tips for Storytellers

The team at WeTestify has created a wonderful guide for those preparing to share an abortion story. You may want to send the guide in its entirety to your congregation, or just to those who have offered to share their stories.

Preparing to Share Our Stories
This script is intended as a springboard for the facilitator's remarks during the event. It is likely that it will not all be relevant to your community, so let it serve as inspiration instead of something to memorize.

Our storytellers are, by their presence and voices today, showing that they will not be silenced by stigma or shame. And those listening are here to bear compassionate witness to their experiences, to learn from them and to let them matter. We are showing up for ourselves and for each other, to hold each other up and be together in community. Let today’s gathering be the beginning of our communal response to end the stigma surrounding abortion, and (for the next chapter of) our work for a world where everyone has the access that they need.

As we listen, let us commit to providing a safe environment for the storytellers and sharers. While not all of the stories will be shared with attribution, we know that each story belongs to someone in our community. Let us respond with generosity and love.

Offer words of welcome specific to your community. Thank co-organizers and storytellers (by name if relevant).

Before I introduce the first speaker, I want to make it clear that there may be some upsetting or graphic details shared. If you feel distressed and need to step out for a moment, please do so. However, I encourage you to sit with discomfort that may arise as we bear testimony.

Introduce the first speaker. You may want to allow for a moment of reflection between stories, or perhaps to let the speakers introduce themselves.

After the final story, thank the audience and storytellers once again for their presence. You may feel it necessary to recap some of the stories and the emotions that arose from them before you provide concluding remarks and next steps.

Before we conclude, perhaps we can all take a deep breath together, (everybody - deep breath). And now let’s take a few moments to sit in silence, to honor all of the stories that we have heard, and the people who have told them. (A few minutes of silence-whatever feels right.)
KOLEINU: Holding Space for Community Members to Tell Their Abortion Stories

Thank you everyone who has shared their story this evening. Thank you to everyone who listened.

I’d like to close with a blessing—for everyone who shared their story tonight, and for everyone who has had—or is having—an abortion, and for everyone who has been—or is, right now, today, being denied abortion care. I want to bless you that the Holy One encounters you, as your self, full of agency and dignity, and you receive blessing.

May the Holy One spread upon all of you a canopy of peace, of safety, of care, of empowerment.

Suggested liturgical text:

U’fros aleinu sukat shlomecha

Spread over us the shelter of Your peace.

Dear [congregation] friends,

On [February 17-18], we are joining the national Jewish community in #ReproShabbat. #ReproShabbat takes place annually on the Shabbat when we read Parashat Mishpatim, including the verses that undergird Judaism’s approach to reproductive health, rights, and justice.

We want to begin this sensitive conversation with you. We want to talk together, as a Jewish community, about abortion. And we want to make space for people of all genders to tell their stories and to be heard, held, and supported at [congregation].
We are inviting you now to share your story with us. You can include your name or share anonymously. It can be about you or something that had an impact on your life. In telling our stories, we hope to erase invisibility, shame, and stigma, and instead remember that abortion is about real people in our midst. It’s about us.

The vast majority of us in this congregation have been affected by abortion and reproductive rights in some way; 1 in 4 people who can get pregnant will have an abortion by the age of 45. Judaism makes space for the experience of abortion; it is permitted, and required when the life of the pregnant person is at stake. We want [our community] to be a space where all people can tell their stories about why they or a partner or family member had an abortion and what it meant to them.

This is a devastating time in our country, as our Constitutional right to abortion access has been undermined; 56% of Americans who can get pregnant (40 million people) currently live in states hostile to abortion rights. There is much work ahead. But we must start in our own sacred home.

[Possible supplementary language:] We also want to acknowledge that we are not a monolithic community, and that there are members of [COMMUNITY NAME] who are uncomfortable with or opposed to abortion. We want to be a place where we can hear one another, where we can learn more from and with each other, and where our members can enter into the conversation from wherever they are and feel respected and cared for. And we want every person with a story to be able to share it and be elevated for their courage, their experience, and their humanity.

If you feel moved to share your story, please do that here. And join us for #ReproShabbat on [February 17-18] to be together and to begin this conversation. If you’d also like to have your story archived through the Jewish Women’s Archive, you can do so here (you can copy and paste from the other form, or record audio.)

Do You Have a Story about Reproductive Rights?

We are inviting you to share your stories about abortion with us. You can include your name or share anonymously. It can be about you or something that had an impact on your life. In telling our stories, we hope to erase invisibility, shame, and stigma, and instead remember that this is about real people in our midst. It’s about us.

1. We may share some of the stories written here during our [#ReproShabbat event. Include day, date, and time.] If you are open to a clergy or lay member reading your story, please let us know the best way to do that:
   ○ I am comfortable with you sharing my story, using my name.
   ○ I am comfortable with you sharing my story anonymously.
   ○ I am not comfortable with you sharing my story.
   ○ I would like to share my story myself.

2. Would you like to speak to a clergy member about your story?
   ○ Yes
   ○ No

3. Please use this space to share your story.

4. Name and email (optional)
