Qualified Immunity’s Flawed Foundation

Alexander A. Reinert*

Qualified immunity has faced trenchant criticism for decades, but recent events have renewed focus on this powerful defense to liability for constitutional violations. This Article takes aim at the roots of the doctrine—fundamental errors that have never been excavated. First, this Article demonstrates that the Supreme Court’s qualified immunity jurisprudence is premised on a flawed application of a dubious canon of statutory construction—namely, that statutes in “derogation” of the common law should be strictly construed. Applying the Derogation Canon, the Court has held that 42 U.S.C. § 1983’s silence regarding immunity should be taken as an implicit adoption of common law immunity defenses. As this Article shows, the Derogation Canon has no appropriate role to play in interpreting Section 1983. Courts and scholars have called it into question for more than a century. Even when courts have applied the canon, they have used it to disfavor displacement of common law claims, not common law defenses. And the Derogation Canon operates in inherent tension with a contrary canon: remedial statutes, like Section 1983, should be given a broad reading.

This Article also identifies a second significant failing in the Court’s qualified immunity law. For even if the Derogation Canon validly applied to defenses, the Reconstruction Congress that passed Section 1983 meant to explicitly displace common law immunities. Most critically, scholars and courts have overlooked the importance of the originally enacted version of Section 1983, which contained a provision that specifically disapproved of any state law limitations on the new cause of action. For unknown reasons, that provision was not

DOI: https://doi.org/10.15779/Z38BK16Q68
Copyright © 2023 Alexander A. Reinert.

* Max Freund Professor of Litigation & Advocacy, Benjamin N. Cardozo School of Law. For their comments on earlier iterations of this Article, I am deeply grateful to Karen Blum, Alan K. Chen, Kevin M. Clermont, Will Crozier IV, Michael C. Dorf, Avlana Eisenberg, Brandon L. Garrett, James Grimmelmann, Michael E. Herz, Ian Moyer, James E. Pfander, Adele Quigley-McBride, Teressa Ravenell, Joanna C. Schwartz, Fred Smith, Jr., Stewart Sterk, and Jennifer Teitcher. For her insights on canons of statutory construction, I owe particular thanks to Anita S. Krishnakumar. For their suggestions regarding the relevance of nineteenth-century common law, I am indebted to John C. P. Goldberg, Anthony J. Sebok, and Benjamin C. Zipursky. included by the Reviser of the Federal Statutes in the first compilation of federal law in 1874. This Article is the first to demonstrate the implications of the lost text of Section 1983.

Taken together, these twin insights show that the problems with the Court’s immunity doctrine run deeper than prior scholarly criticism has imagined. Much of current qualified immunity scholarship has addressed, in compelling fashion, how the Court has taken the immunity doctrine too far from its common law origins. But this Article shows that qualified immunity is flawed from the ground up. In other words, the problem with current qualified immunity doctrine is not just that it departs from the common law immunity that existed in 1871. The Court has failed to grapple with the strong arguments that no immunity doctrine at all should apply in Section 1983 actions.

Introduction ................................................................. 203
I. Pierson and the Emergence of Modern Qualified Immunity Doctrine ........................................................................ 208
II. An Intellectual and Doctrinal History of the Derogation Canon .... 218
   A. Scholarly Treatment of the Derogation Canon .............. 218
   B. The Derogation Canon in Nineteenth-Century Caselaw .... 221
   C. The Derogation Canon from the Twentieth Century to the Present ................................................................. 228
III. The Lost Text of Section 1983 ...................................... 234
   A. The Civil Rights Act of 1871’s Abrogation of Common Law Defenses ................................................................. 235
   B. The Notwithstanding Clause and the Civil Rights Act of 1871’s History and Structure ............................................ 238
IV. Implications and Objections ........................................ 242
Conclusion ........................................................................ 246
INTRODUCTION

Qualified immunity—the affirmative defense available to government officials sued in damages for violations of federal law—is under renewed assault. Critics who otherwise share little common ground attack the doctrine on multiple grounds. Scholars and practitioners claim that it imposes insuperable barriers to relief in important civil rights litigation brought under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 and other federal law. Others argue that immunity doctrine is inconsistent with Section 1983’s text and purpose. Constitutional theorists question the gap it leaves between rights and remedies. And empiricists call into doubt its effectiveness as a matter of policy.\textsuperscript{5} This is only a brief rehearsal of the doctrine’s alleged failings.\textsuperscript{6}

This Article adds a heretofore unexplored critique: there is no foundation to the interpretive premise upon which qualified immunity rests. The methodology the Court used to create the doctrine—the canon of construction disfavoring implied repeal of the common law—was never a legitimate ground for importing common law defenses into newly created statutory rights. And when the Court applied this flawed methodology to its interpretive task, it made a second mistake: it disregarded the explicit (albeit obscured) statutory text of the 1871 Civil Rights Act, the original version of Section 1983, which speaks to the Reconstruction Congress’s intent to create liability for constitutional violations and displace any existing common law immunities. The Supreme Court has never explained how this text can be squared with the Court’s immunity jurisprudence. This Article is the first scholarly effort to excavate Section 1983’s original language and explore its significant implications.

Qualified immunity, as the name implies, is conditional. Unlike absolute immunity, which bars recovery regardless of how egregious the legal violation,\textsuperscript{7} qualified immunity contemplates that damages may sometimes be recovered against government officials. The Court introduced the doctrine in a 1967 decision involving Mississippi police officers, \textit{Pierson v. Ray}.\textsuperscript{8} There, the Court held that 42 U.S.C. § 1983 incorporated a “good faith” immunity defense that protected government officials from liability at common law in 1871, when Congress enacted Section 1983.\textsuperscript{9} Much of \textit{Pierson’s} logic flowed from the Court’s earlier decision in \textit{Tenney v. Brandhove}, which held that Section 1983 did not abolish legislative immunity recognized at common law.\textsuperscript{10} Since \textit{Pierson}, the Court has modified and extended qualified immunity doctrine; the doctrine

\begin{itemize}
\item \textsuperscript{8} 386 U.S. 547, 553–57 (1967).
\item \textsuperscript{9} Id. at 557. \textit{See also} Rehberg v. Paulk, 566 U.S. 356, 361–62 (2012) (collecting cases discussing the Court’s assumption that Congress did not intend Section 1983 to revoke common law immunities).
\item \textsuperscript{10} 341 U.S. 367, 376 (1951). \textit{See also} Pulliam v. Allen, 466 U.S. 522, 529 (1984) (“The starting point in our own analysis is the common law. Our cases have proceeded on the assumption that common law principles of . . . immunity were incorporated into our judicial system and that they should not be abrogated absent clear legislative intent to do so.”).}

\end{itemize}
now protects officers regardless of their good faith, so long as they behaved reasonably in light of clearly established law.11

Critics have long argued that the modern extension of qualified immunity is an improper form of federal common law-making.12 These ideas have gained traction recently: Justice Clarence Thomas has expressed openness to arguments that the Court’s immunity doctrine is illegitimate judge-made law that departs from the common law defense that existed when Congress enacted Section 1983.13 On some accounts, this criticism means that courts must abandon the current qualified immunity doctrine in favor of the immunity that existed circa 1871.14 These critics accept Pierson’s logic—that Congress meant to adopt the good-faith immunity that existed at common law—because of what I call the Derogation Canon, the canon of statutory interpretation that statutes in “derogation” of the common law should be strictly construed.15 If Congress meant to overrule the common law doctrine of qualified immunity, according to this account, it would have done so explicitly.

But this criticism is only half-right. Will Baude, among others, correctly observed that current qualified immunity doctrine departs significantly from common law principles.16 This said, it does not follow that rejecting the Court’s current qualified immunity doctrine requires substituting whatever immunity doctrine existed at common law in 1871. This is so for several reasons that scholars have overlooked.

First, as a matter of interpretive methodology, the Derogation Canon is a tenuous one upon which to base any importation of immunity doctrine into Section 1983. At the time Congress passed the Civil Rights Acts, influential treatises called the canon into question, given its roots in a judicial supremacist world in which courts viewed common law as a font of perfection and were

---

12. See, e.g., Rudovsky, supra note 4, at 74.

14. Baxter, 140 S. Ct. at 1864 (2020) (Thomas, J., dissenting from denial of cert) (“Regardless of what the outcome would be, we at least ought to return to the approach of asking whether immunity was historically accorded the relevant official in an analogous situation at common law.”) (internal quotation marks omitted).

15. This canon takes many forms, including (1) the idea that common law is not to be overruled by implication and (2) the presumption that the common law supplies the “default” rule against which Congress legislates. See Comcast Corp. v. Nat’l Ass’n of Afr. Am.-Owned Media, 140 S. Ct. 1009, 1014 (2020) (using “default rule” formulation); United States v. Texas, 507 U.S. 529, 534 (1993) (“In order to abrogate a common-law principle, the statute must speak directly to the question addressed by the common law.”) (internal quotation marks omitted). For purposes of this Article, these formulations all are considered part of the Derogation Canon.

16. See, e.g., Baude, supra note 6, at 77–80.
skeptical of parliamentary intervention.\textsuperscript{17} That criticism has only grown over time. In 1908, Roscoe Pound amplified the concerns about the canon’s legitimacy, concluding that its “archaic notions of interpretation” made it “wholly inapplicable to and out of place in American law of today.”\textsuperscript{18} And while the Supreme Court was relying on the canon in its mid-1950s and 1960s decisions regarding immunity and Section 1983, scholars were debating its validity.\textsuperscript{19} In modern times, the late Justice Antonin Scalia has been one of many who have criticized application of the canon.\textsuperscript{20} Indeed, it is ironic that Justices have invoked the Derogation Canon while claiming to give effect to the Reconstruction Congress’s original intent in passing Section 1983,\textsuperscript{21} given that the canon itself aims to limit the power of the legislature and enhance the power of judges.\textsuperscript{22}

But even if one accepts that the Derogation Canon should guide statutory interpretation, applying the canon to Section 1983 is questionable. In general, outside of the criminal context, courts have relied on the canon to disfavor displacement of common law claims or rights, not common law defenses.\textsuperscript{23} And the Derogation Canon stands in tension with the presumption that remedial statutes should be read broadly.\textsuperscript{24} This is especially so for statutes that, like Section 1983, created rights of action in new substantive areas of law.\textsuperscript{25} It is thus no surprise that from the Founding Era until Reconstruction, the Derogation Canon was never used as a means to dilute statutory rights by implying a

\begin{itemize}
  \item \textsuperscript{17} See infra Part II.A.
  \item To the contrary, as I demonstrate in this Article, there are compelling reasons to believe that the 1871 Congress would have been surprised to learn that the Court has read the immunity defense into the text of Section 1983. \textit{Infra} Part II.A & B.
  \item See infra Part II.C.
\end{itemize}
common law defense. And even after Reconstruction, courts used the canon primarily to protect pre-existing rights at common law from statutory incursion. Reconstruction-era legislators would thus have had no reason to believe that courts would incorporate common law defenses into Section 1983’s newly created cause of action.

Putting aside these compelling reasons for concluding that the Derogation Canon is an inappropriate vehicle for importing common law defenses into Section 1983, there is a second piece of evidence demonstrating that the Court’s immunity jurisprudence is a profound misadventure: the Reconstruction Congress adopted explicit text that displaced common law defenses when it enacted the original version of Section 1983. To appreciate this point, one must dig beyond the conventional analyses of Section 1983. Most critically, scholars and courts have overlooked the importance of the version of Section 1983 that the Reconstruction Congress enacted. The Civil Rights Act of 1871 created a cause of action for violation of federal law by state actors—what we now call Section 1983—and made clear that such a claim would be viable notwithstanding “any such law, statute, ordinance, regulation, custom, or usage of the State to the contrary.” For reasons unknown, this critical clause (for purposes of this Article, I will call it the “Notwithstanding Clause”) was omitted when the Reviser of the Federal Statutes, who lacked any authority to alter positive law, published the first compilation of federal law in 1874. That error was compounded when the Revised Statutes were collected in the United States Code. But because the common law of immunity for state actors, to the extent any existed, was generally state law immunity, Section 1983’s original text conveys congressional intent that immunity defenses should not apply to the newly created civil rights actions. What’s more, this reading is confirmed by contemporaneous legislative history and other provisions of the Civil Rights Act of 1871.

In other words, the problem with current qualified immunity doctrine is not just that it departs from the common law immunity that existed when Section

---

26. See infra Part II.B. Indeed, it is noteworthy that when the defendants in Pierson pressed their claim that common law immunities should apply to Section 1983, they could only cite to cases concerning common law rights of action, not purported general defenses. Mobile Gas Serv. Corp. v. Fed. Power Comm’n, 215 F.2d 883, 889 (3d Cir. 1954), aff’d sub nom. United Gas Pipe Line Co. v. Mobile Gas Serv. Corp., 350 U.S. 332 (1956) (statute does not displace common law contract right); Am. Dist. Tel. Co. v. Kittleson, 179 F.2d 946, 953 (8th Cir. 1950) (statute does not displace common law tort action for indemnity); Scharfeld v. Richardson, 133 F.2d 340, 341–44 (D.C. Cir. 1942) (statute does not displace common law’s treatment of dog as personal property for purpose of tort damages).

27. See infra Part II.C.

28. An Act to Enforce the Provisions of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and for Other Purposes, 17 Stat. 13 (1871) [hereinafter “Civil Rights Act of 1871”].

29. See infra Part III.A.

30. 42 U.S.C. § 1983 does not include the Notwithstanding Clause in its text. See infra notes 229-235 and accompanying text.

31. See infra Part III.C.
1983 was enacted, as scholars have argued and at least Justice Thomas has hinted. That is true, but it is only half the story. The real problem is that no qualified immunity doctrine at all should apply in Section 1983 actions, if courts stay true to the text adopted by the enacting Congress and other evidence of legislative intent.

This Article develops these arguments in four parts. Part I briefly rehearses the history of qualified immunity doctrine and the criticisms that have been leveled against it. Part II excavates Pierson’s failure—its unprecedented application of the Derogation Canon to incorporate a common law defense into a novel remedial statute like Section 1983. Part III shows that, even if the Derogation Canon should apply to Section 1983, text and legislative history show that Congress did not intend for common law immunities to bar actions brought under Section 1983. Part IV evaluates the significant implications of this Article, which go beyond qualified immunity doctrine, and addresses anticipated objections.

I. PIERSON AND THE EMERGENCE OF MODERN QUALIFIED IMMUNITY DOCTRINE

When civil rights litigators seek damages against state and local officials under 42 U.S.C. § 1983, or against federal officials via Bivens actions, there are many barriers to success. Among the most closely scrutinized is the doctrine of qualified immunity, which protects officers from damages liability even when they violate the Constitution, if the law was not “clearly established” or if the officers reasonably believed they were not acting unconstitutionally.

The seeds of the qualified immunity defense were sown in Tenney v. Breedlove, which concerned whether Section 1983 permitted damages claims against state legislators. The Court started by tracing the long history of legislative immunity, found at common law and in both state and federal constitutions. Federalism and separation of powers principles all suggested that legislative immunity was necessary for a functioning representative democracy. Even after making the “big assumption” that Congress had the power “to limit the freedom of State legislators acting within their traditional sphere,” the Court asked whether it could make “an even rasher assumption to find that Congress thought it had exercised the power.” The Court’s framing presaged the answer: no, because absent some evidence from the text or “spelled out in debate,” the Court could not conclude that Congress contemplated doing away with a “tradition so well grounded in history and reason by covert inclusion in the general language before us.” At the same time that the Court upheld absolute immunity for legislators, it recognized that the immunity might not extend to “an official acting on behalf of the legislature,” suggesting a potential distinction between legislators and other state officials.

36. Id. at 372–75.
37. Id. at 372–76.

Sixteen years after Tenney, the Court addressed the reach of Section 1983 in actions brought against a judge and three police officers in Pierson v. Ray. The plaintiffs were Freedom Riders who were arrested while protesting segregated bus facilities in Jackson, Mississippi in September 1961. While the court of appeals found that the judge was entitled to absolute immunity, it interpreted the Supreme Court’s decision in Monroe v. Pape to preclude any immunity for Section 1983 claims against police officers. In the Supreme Court, judicial immunity was low-hanging fruit; like the legislative immunity recognized in Tenney, judicial immunity was well established at common law and necessary to preserve an independent judiciary, and the Court found no “clear indication” in the legislative record that Congress intended to abrogate “wholesale all common-law immunities.” For police officers, however, the Court concluded that while there was no tradition in the common law of an “absolute and unqualified immunity,” a more limited good-faith immunity was appropriate. The Court rejected the Fifth Circuit’s understanding of Monroe, noting that Monroe stated that Section 1983 “should be read against the background of tort liability that makes a man responsible for the natural consequences of his actions.” And the background of tort liability, according to the Pierson Court, supported a good-faith or probable-cause defense, at least

38. Id. at 376.
39. Id.
40. Id. at 378–79 (citing Kilbourn v. Thompson, 103 U.S. 168, 204–05 (1880)). The Tenney Court observed that Kilbourn had “allowed a judgment” against the Sergeant-at-Arms acting at the order of the House, even if the legislators who directed him to act could not be held accountable. Id. at 378.
43. Pierson v. Ray, 352 F.2d 213, 217 (5th Cir. 1965).
44. 365 U.S. 167 (1961).
45. Pierson, 352 F.3d at 218. The Fifth Circuit did not explain its reasoning but claimed that its holding followed from Monroe’s imposition of Section 1983 liability even where officers did not act willfully. Id.
46. Pierson, 386 U.S. at 554.
47. Id. at 555.
“in the case of police officers making an arrest.” The Court was less clear about the source of that common law immunity for officers—unlike with legislative or judicial immunity, it did not canvass the common law of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, but instead referred to contemporaneous Mississippi common law doctrine from the 1950s.

Whether the Pierson Court had intended that its good-faith immunity be limited or adjudicated on a case-by-case basis, it soon became clear that the immunity had a broad reach. First, the Court applied it across the board to state officials who exercised non-ministerial functions. In Scheuer v. Rhodes, the Court relied on Pierson to find that Ohio’s Governor and other state officials, sued after the National Guard shot and killed four students during anti-war protests at Kent State University, were all entitled to qualified immunity of varied scope. And in Wood v. Strickland, the Court relied on Pierson, Scheuer, and state common law to extend a good-faith immunity to school board members sued for damages arising from student disciplinary proceedings. After Pierson, therefore, the Court consistently relied on the presumptions

49. Pierson, 386 U.S. at 556–57. Pierson’s reliance on that sentence from Monroe is puzzling in the context of immunities. First, read literally—that a defendant should be “responsible for the natural consequences of his actions”—the sentence undermines any argument for immunity. Immunity functions in exactly the opposite fashion: it renders a defendant unaccountable for the consequences of his actions, so long as he meets certain conditions of the defense. Second, when read in the context of Monroe itself, it is clear that the Court was referring to background principles of tort law to contrast Section 1983 with the Civil Rights Act’s criminal analog, now codified at 18 U.S.C. § 242. The Court relied on these background principles to justify its holding that it should be easier to establish civil liability under Section 1983 than criminal liability under Section 242. See Monroe, 365 U.S. at 188 (contrasting Section 1983 with criminal civil rights statute interpreted in Screws v. United States, 325 U.S. 91, 101–103 (1945)).

50. The Pierson Court relied on the Court of Appeals’s application of Mississippi’s good-faith immunity for state law claims for false arrest and imprisonment to support its holding that a good-faith defense also applies to Section 1983 claims arising out of the same facts. 365 U.S. at 557 (“We hold that the defense of good faith and probable cause, which the Court of Appeals found available to the officers in the common law action for false arrest and imprisonment, is also available to them in the action under § 1983.”). Justice Douglas dissented, relying on the text, purpose, and legislative history of Section 1983 to conclude that Congress did not mean to import common law doctrines of judicial immunity or good-faith immunity for police officers. Id. at 564–66 (Douglas, J., dissenting).

52. The shootings at Kent State took place on May 4, 1970, during a demonstration opposing the expansion of American military presence into Cambodia and protesting the National Guard’s presence on campus. See John Fitzgerald O’Hara, Kent State/May 4 and Postwar Memory, 58 AM. Q. 301, 302 (2006). Criminal charges against eight national guardsmen were dismissed, and the civil rights action in Scheuer was eventually settled after a trial and subsequent appeal. Id. at 302–03; Yale Preserves History of Kent State Tragedy, N.Y. TIMES, May 6, 1900, 12CN, at 6 [https://perma.cc/U6XH-AD52].

53. 416 U.S. at 247 (noting that the scope of immunity would depend “upon the scope of discretion and responsibilities of the officer and all the circumstances as they reasonably appeared at the time of the action on which liability is sought to be based”).

55. Id. at 318.
against implied repeal of the common law in the context of Section 1983 immunities.\textsuperscript{56}

Second and most consequentially, in \textit{Harlow v. Fitzgerald}, decided in 1982, the Court rejected the common law “good-faith” version of qualified immunity applied in \textit{Pierson} and its progeny, choosing instead an objective test that focused on the reasonableness of the officer’s behavior in light of “clearly established” law.\textsuperscript{57} The Court saw the good-faith standard, with its emphasis on the subjective intentions of the defendant, as insufficiently protective against “ingenious plaintiff’s counsel” who could create material issues of fact based on little evidence, thereby surviving summary judgment and forcing a trial or settlement.\textsuperscript{58} Instead, the Court implemented an “objective reasonableness” standard to “permit the resolution of many insubstantial claims on summary judgment.”\textsuperscript{59} Much of \textit{Harlow}’s basic structure survives to this day. If an official can establish either that the relevant constitutional law was not clear enough, \textit{or} that she reasonably believed her conduct was lawful in light of clearly established law under the circumstances as she understood them,\textsuperscript{60} then she is immune from damages liability.

\textit{Harlow} expressly sought to mediate the tension between providing citizens with a remedy for constitutional violations while recognizing that “claims frequently run against the innocent as well as the guilty—at a cost not only to the defendant officials, but to society as a whole.”\textsuperscript{61} Over time, even though \textit{Harlow}’s basic standard has survived, the Court has slowly come to emphasize almost exclusively the latter over the former; protecting defendants from suit appears to be the Court’s prime directive.

One can see this trend in the procedural accommodations made to defendants who raise the immunity defense. Defendants can invoke qualified immunity at any time: at the motion to dismiss stage, after limited or full

\begin{itemize}
  \item \textsuperscript{56} Malley v. Briggs, 475 U.S. 335, 339–42 (1986) (looking to common law to determine context of officer seeking an arrest warrant but recognizing that policies of Section 1983 could displace common law’s guidance); Briscoe v. LaHue, 460 U.S. 325, 337 (1983) (“[W]e find no evidence that Congress intended to abrogate the traditional common-law witness immunity in § 1983 actions.”); Procunier v. Navarette, 434 U.S. 555, 561 (1978) (“Although the Court has recognized that in enacting § 1983 Congress must have intended to expose state officials to damages liability in some circumstances, the section has been consistently construed as not intending wholesale revocation of the common-law immunity afforded government officials.”); Imbler v. Pachtman, 424 U.S. 409, 418 (1976) (“The decision in \textit{Tenney} established that § 1983 is to be read in harmony with general principles of tort immunities and defenses rather than in derogation of them.”).
  \item \textsuperscript{57} See \textit{Harlow v. Fitzgerald}, 457 U.S. 800, 818 (1982). See also \textit{Malley}, 475 U.S. at 341.
  \item \textsuperscript{58} \textit{Harlow}, 457 U.S. at 817 n.29 (internal quotation marks omitted).
  \item \textsuperscript{59} \textit{Id}. at 818.
  \item \textsuperscript{60} Qualified immunity has been described as an affirmative defense. See \textit{Gomez v. Toledo}, 446 U.S. 635, 640 (1980). But not every circuit consistently allocates to the defendant the burdens of establishing the defense. See Alexander A. Reinert, \textit{Qualified Immunity at Trial}, 93 NOTRE DAME L. REV. 2065, 2071–72 (2018) (describing different approaches to allocating burdens).
  \item \textsuperscript{61} \textit{Harlow}, 457 U.S. at 814.
\end{itemize}
discovery through summary judgment, and at trial. The Court has directed lower court judges to resolve qualified immunity, if possible, prior to trial, for the value of the immunity is "effectively lost if a case is erroneously permitted to go to trial." Defendants may seek protection from discovery until the threshold legal question of qualified immunity is resolved. And defendants sued in federal court may seek interlocutory appeals when the defense is rejected—sometimes triggering multiple appeals in a single case—of otherwise unappealable denials of motions to dismiss or summary judgment, so long as the appeal is confined to law-based qualified immunity arguments. This exception to the final judgment rule is justified as one more tool for public officials to terminate insubstantial suits promptly.

The defendant-friendly trend in qualified immunity is also reflected in the gradual narrowing of what constitutes “clearly established” law for the purposes of the defense. Over the years, the Court has insisted on increased factual similarity between prior cases and the defendants’ alleged conduct to overcome the immunity defense. Only a few decisions break this monotony, and those are exceptions that prove the rule because they involve the rare case in which a constitutional violation is so obvious that one would not need a prior case to establish it with clarity. But in the main, the Court has spent the past three decades progressively and forcefully emphasizing that, for law to be “clearly established,” prior cases must speak with such clarity that only a “plainly incompetent” official would fail to see the unlawfulness of their conduct.

Finally, one can see the Supreme Court’s solicitude for defendants in its tinkering with the mechanism for how “clearly established” law develops over time. As law develops and becomes better established, qualified immunity becomes a less effective defense. But law cannot become “clearly established” unless courts resolve the predicate, merits-based question of whether a plaintiff’s constitutional rights were even violated by the defendant’s conduct. In the absence of initial guidance from the Supreme Court, some courts tended to resolve the merits question first, turning to qualified immunity only if

---

65. See Behrens, 516 U.S. at 307–09; Mitchell, 472 U.S. at 526–27. Not every issue raised in the district court will be reviewable by an appellate court, however. In general, what is immediately appealable in a qualified immunity case is the “essentially legal question whether the conduct of which the plaintiff complains violated clearly established law.” Id. at 526.
66. See Behrens, 516 U.S. at 306.
67. Hope v. Pelzer, 536 U.S. 730, 741–44 (2002) (holding that qualified immunity was inappropriate where plaintiff was tied to a hitching post for hours and denied access to water). See also Taylor v. Riojas, 141 S. Ct. 52, 54 (2020) (per curiam) (citing Hope and holding that qualified immunity was unavailable on “the particularly egregious facts of this case”).
necessary. Other courts, however, found it convenient at times to resolve qualified immunity first, for if the law was not clearly established, it was unnecessary to determine whether any constitutional violation was stated. The Supreme Court intervened and stopped the latter practice in 1999 and 2001, directing lower courts to apply a mandatory two-step analysis to motions seeking qualified immunity. Under the Saucier two-step analysis, defendants were first required to show that, after drawing all factual inferences in plaintiffs’ favor, plaintiffs have not alleged facts which “show the officer’s conduct violated a constitutional right.” If defendants could not meet this burden, they then were required to show that they nonetheless were entitled to qualified immunity under either of the two prongs identified above.

Almost immediately, members of the Court and some lower court judges criticized this mandatory sequencing rule for unnecessarily forcing judges to decide difficult constitutional questions. So in 2009, in Pearson v. Callahan, the Court abandoned its rule and gave lower courts discretion to decide for themselves whether to address the merits question or the immunity question first. The Court justified the shift based on the concern that the Saucier two-step analysis would lead courts to issue advisory opinions by unnecessarily deciding whether the plaintiff’s allegations established a violation of the law. In taking account of this fear, however, the Court opened itself up to a different criticism: skipping Saucier’s first step causes constitutional law to become static as courts focus on whether particular rights were clearly established, rather than whether the right exists at all. And if, as empirical evidence suggests, courts

---

70. See, e.g., Horne v. Coughlin, 191 F.3d 244, 248 (2d Cir. 1999); Somers v. Thurman, 109 F.3d 614, 617 (9th Cir. 1997).
72. Saucier, 533 U.S. at 201. This is essentially the same inquiry that is required by any Rule 12(b)(6) motion.
73. Id.
76. Id. at 240–41.
77. Id. at 242–43.
78. See Nancy Leong, The Saucier Qualified Immunity Experiment: An Empirical Analysis, 36 PEP. L. REV. 667, 670 (2009) (finding that judicial avoidance decreased when courts were required to follow the two-step approach of Saucier); Aaron L. Nielson & Christopher J. Walker, The New Qualified Immunity, 89 S. CAL. L. REV. 1, 49 (2015) (finding that judges are less likely to decide constitutional questions when the rights at issue are not clearly established).
do not decide whether the right exists at all, no new clearly established law will be created, leaving victims of constitutional violations unprotected.

The Court’s strengthening of qualified immunity’s protections over time has generated significant academic attention. Commentators have criticized the gradual ratcheting up of the protections the defense offers. Many scholars, most notably Joanna Schwartz, have provided empirical evidence that undermines the Court’s assumption that qualified immunity is necessary to protect government officials from the threat of civil liability. Perhaps most significantly, scholars have questioned the very genesis of the doctrine, arguing that the Court misconstrued the common law at the time Section 1983 was enacted.

This fundamental assault on the Court’s use of common law immunity doctrine to inform its reading of Section 1983 has persisted for decades but has earned renewed attention in the past few years. Many years ago, scholars observed both that the Court’s original conception of qualified immunity in Pierson was untethered from the common law of 1871, and that, in any case,

---

79. A comprehensive discussion of qualified immunity scholarship would test the patience of even the most devoted reader. By way of illustration, Westlaw reports that as of December 20, 2021, since 1980 there are 427 law review articles with the words “qualified immunity” in the title. This is surely a significant underestimate of the articles devoting substantial discussion to the doctrine—Westlaw reports that there are at least 1,650 law review articles in which the phrase “qualified immunity” is used ten times or more over the same time period.

80. See supra notes 4 & 6.

82. Justice Clarence Thomas recently endorsed this argument in his concurrence in Ziglar v. Abbasi, 137 S. Ct. 1843, 1869, 1871–72 (2017) (Thomas, J., concurring in part and concurring in the judgment). In his opinion, Justice Thomas openly invited argument that the Court’s qualified immunity doctrine has gone off the rails. Id. Citing Will Baude’s law review article, Justice Thomas noted his “growing concern with our qualified immunity jurisprudence.” Id. at 1870; see supra note 6.

83. See Achtenberg, supra note 4, at 499–500 (arguing that Section 1983 should be read to incorporate only those immunities that are consistent with protecting individual rights); Beermann, supra note 3, at 57–70 (discussing the Court’s approach to immunities in Section 1983, sourcing it in the canon of construction that strictly construes statutes in derogation of common law, and criticizing the Court for failing to explain its dissonant treatment of gaps in Section 1983’s text); Coleman, supra note 6, at 676–77, 686 (arguing that the Court’s reliance on common law of 1871 is fraught because of the difficulty of ascertaining the content of the common law and criticizing Pierson because no good-faith immunity for officers existed and the Court was creating the defense on its own); Seth F. Kreimer, The Source of Law in Civil Rights Actions: Some Old Light on Section 1988, 133 U. PA. L. REV. 601, 609–10 (1985) (explaining how the Court’s immunity defense is detached from 1871 common law); Matasar, supra note 3, at 747 (“The Court believes these hundred-year-old variances are critical because it assumes the drafters of section 1983 incorporated and froze common law rules current in 1871 into section 1983, despite adopting language which seemed to obliterate official immunity.”); id. at 758–59 (arguing that judicial immunity at common law differed from what the Court has adopted).

84. In one case from Maine, for example, a plaintiff brought suit after he had been held in solitary confinement in prison for longer than his original sentence. Gross v. Rice, 71 Me. 241, 246 (1880). The Warden defended against the action by pointing to a statute which permitted prison officials to hold someone beyond their criminal sentence if they had been disciplined with solitary confinement for violating prison rules. Id. at 252. The Warden acknowledged that the statute had subsequently been declared unconstitutional but argued that he had presumed it was valid when he applied it to the plaintiff, in effect raising what we would now call a qualified immunity defense. Id. The 1880 court rejected the by the time the Court transformed the defense into an objective one based on “clearly established law,” the Court had departed significantly from the common law roots. This criticism has come into sharper focus ever since Supreme Court Justice Clarence Thomas referred to it in a concurrence in 2017.85

Citing a law review article by Will Baude, Justice Thomas noted his “growing concern with our qualified immunity jurisprudence.”86 As Justice Thomas explained, when qualified immunity doctrine was first identified, the Court based the doctrine on its understanding of the common law immunity in existence when Congress enacted the 1871 Act.87 As summarized above, the Court claimed that a subjective good-faith immunity existed at common law for law enforcement officers sued in tort.88 The contours of that immunity, Justice Thomas maintained, were context-dependent—for example, the good-faith immunity applied in Pierson was tied to the specific false arrest and imprisonment claim brought by the plaintiffs in that case.89 Harlow, however, transformed qualified immunity from a contextual, subjective good-faith defense to a broad, objective reasonableness standard based on the content of “clearly established” law.90 From Justice Thomas’s perspective, this change was not a product of statutory interpretation but a “freewheeling policy choice” associated with federal common law.91 In the wake of Justice Thomas’s concurrence, scholars and advocates have openly mused about the end of qualified immunity.92 But there is no indication that a majority of the Supreme Court shares Justice Thomas’s skepticism.93

Warden’s argument with little trouble, based both on Maine jurisprudence and other authorities. Id. at 252. This was the dominant rule in both state and federal courts during the nineteenth century. See James E. Pfander, Zones of Discretion at Common Law, 116 NW. U. L. REV. ONLINE 148, 167–168 & n.111 (collecting authority). Today’s Supreme Court, by contrast, is far more friendly to defendants. In Heien v. North Carolina, for example, the Court held that no Fourth Amendment violation occurred when an officer made a reasonable mistake of law, including when the officer relied upon a law that was subsequently declared unconstitutional, and stated that the qualified immunity analysis is even more “forgiving” toward an officer. Heien v. North Carolina, 574 U.S. 54, 64, 67 (2014).

85. See Ziglar, 137 S. Ct. at 1870 (Thomas, J., concurring in part and concurring in the judgment).
86. Id. (citing Baude, supra note 6).
87. Id.
88. Supra notes 42–51 and accompanying text.
89. See Ziglar, 137 S. Ct. at 1870–71 (Thomas, J., concurring in part and concurring in the judgment) (citing Pierson v. Ray, 386 U.S. 547, 555–57 (1967)).
90. Id. at 1871.
91. Id.
93. None of Justice Thomas’s “conservative” colleagues on the Court has joined in his call for revisiting qualified immunity, and while Justice Sotomayor has frequently criticized the Court’s immunity doctrine, her objections appear grounded in how the doctrine has been applied, not in a general
Even were a majority to coalesce around Justice Thomas’s suggestion that defenses available at common law in 1871 should also be available in Section 1983 actions, the Court would have to confront many difficult questions. Civil rights actions against federal officials are not based in Section 1983, but instead are implied directly from the Constitution under Bivens and its progeny.

For these claims, the Court could claim greater authority to craft judge-made defenses that depart from common law principles. As for Section 1983 actions, turning directly to the common law that existed in 1871 skips at least two analytical steps. It assumes that the gap in Section 1983 should be filled by a uniform “common law,” when in other contexts (statutes of limitations, for example), the law governing Section 1983 varies depending on the law of the forum state. More problematically, it assumes that Congress meant for common law defenses to be incorporated sub silentio into Section 1983.

This Article focuses on the second, more important analytical question and asks why the common law of 1871 is even relevant to understanding Section 1983. After all, the statute itself makes no reference to any immunity and appears to provide for liability whenever a state actor causes injury by violating federal law. The Court has settled on its answer—the Derogation Canon—which it objection to federal-judge-made law. See, e.g., Kisela v. Hughes, 138 S. Ct. 1148, 1162 (2018) (Sotomayor, J., dissenting) criticizing the Court’s “one-sided” application of qualified immunity). And while bipartisan enthusiasm for reforming qualified immunity has at times appeared high in the Senate and House of Representatives, no politically viable option has yet emerged. See Marianne Levine & Nicholas Wu, Lawmakers Scrap Qualified Immunity Deal in Police Reform Talks, POLITICO (Aug. 17, 2021), https://www.politico.com/news/2021/08/17/lawmakers-immunity-police-reform-talks-505671 [https://perma.cc/9RET-3HU7]. More innovation, instead, has taken place at the state level, in the form of the creation of state law analogues to Section 1983 that do not include any qualified immunity defense. See Alexander A. Reinert, Joanna C. Schwartz & James E. Pfander, New Federalism and Civil Rights Enforcement, 116 Nw. U. L. Rev. 737, 758–63 (2021).

95. Mims-Crocker, supra note 6, at 1458–59. As a result, Bivens claims might end up bearing even less resemblance to constitutional claims brought against state actors.

96. A separate provision of the Civil Rights Act of 1871 directs courts to look to state law as a gap filler when federal law does not speak to issues arising in Section 1983 litigation or when they are “deficient in the provisions necessary to furnish suitable remedies.” See 42 U.S.C. § 1988(a). The Supreme Court has relied upon Section 1988 to determine that, while the applicable statute of limitations for Section 1983 claims is a matter of federal law, it may look to state personal injury statutes of limitations because doing so is not inconsistent with federal law. Wilson v. Garcia, 471 U.S. 261, 268–70 (1985).

97. See 42 U.S.C. § 1983 (stating that “every person” who violates the constitutional rights of another “shall be liable to the party injured”) (emphasis added).
takes to mean that absent clear language, statutes in “derogation” of the common law should be strictly construed.98

In the immunity context, the Court has applied this canon to look beyond the text of Section 1983, finding implicit congressional intent to codify the common law good-faith defense that the Court found to be extant when Section 1983 was originally enacted.99 Over time, the Court has repeatedly confirmed that this canon led it to find absolute and qualified immunity defenses for officials sued under Section 1983.100

The remainder of this Article evaluates why the Court’s reliance on this canon is misplaced and shows the consequences that flow from that conclusion.101 As I demonstrate below, using the canon to import a common law defense for a novel remedial statute like Section 1983 is unprecedented. And even were the Derogation Canon appropriate for the task, explicit text makes clear that the Reconstruction Congress meant to displace state law immunities such as the one initially applied in Pierson. Ultimately, rather than mediate Section 1983 liability against the backdrop of the common law immunities extant during Reconstruction, as Justice Thomas and some academics have argued,102 qualified immunity and some aspects of absolute immunity103 simply are not applicable in Section 1983 litigation. The Court’s continued application of the defense has no basis in text, history, or doctrine—it is instead the exercise of illegitimate judicial power in the face of contrary legislative text and intent. Significantly, this means that Congress need not act to abrogate qualified immunity, even if advocates would welcome legislative reform.104

98. The Court did not refer specifically to the Derogation Canon in Tenney or in Pierson, but both decisions emphasized the assumption behind the canon: that had Congress meant to abrogate common law principles via Section 1983, it would have stated so explicitly. See Pierson v. Ray, 386 U.S. 547, 554–55 (1967); Tenney v. Bredlove, 341 U.S. 367, 376 (1951). Moreover, the dissent in Pierson recognized the majority’s reasoning as based on the Derogation Canon, the parties’ arguments centered on the canon, and subsequent cases have clarified that the current Court grounds its immunity doctrine on the canon. See Pierson, 386 U.S. at 561 (Douglas, J., dissenting); Brief for Respondents at 34, Pierson v. Ray, 386 U.S. 547 (1967), 1966 WL 115420; supra note 57 (collecting cases).
100. See supra note 56 (collecting cases).
101. Of course, one might argue that the Derogation Canon is misplaced for different reasons. We might choose to understand Section 1983 as a statute in furtherance rather than in derogation of the common law, seeking to secure the effective enforcement of law against government officers who were already subject (in theory) to its limitations. If so, perhaps different canons, with different implications for the role of common law, would follow, but this exploration is beyond the scope of this paper.
102. Baude, supra note 6, at 77 (describing as “extreme” the argument that Section 1983 permits no immunities and making the more limited argument that the Court’s qualified immunity doctrine departs “from ordinary principles of legal interpretation”).
103. As I discuss below, there are colorable arguments that both legislative and judicial immunities stand on distinct and more secure footing than qualified immunity or absolute prosecutorial immunity. See infra notes 276–278.
104. As I discuss infra, stare decisis principles are at their peak when the question involves one of longstanding statutory interpretation. See infra notes 278–282 and accompanying text. But there are
II. AN INTELLECTUAL AND DOCTRINAL HISTORY OF THE DEROGATION CANON

The Derogation Canon has a checkered history. Criticized by commentators since the mid-nineteenth century, it nonetheless has played a meaningful, albeit limited, role in the Supreme Court’s statutory interpretation jurisprudence. In this Section, I first trace the history of scholarly treatment of the canon before turning to its development in the Supreme Court. Both commentary and case law demonstrate that, even had Reconstruction legislators been aware of the Derogation Canon, they would have had no reason to think that it would apply to incorporate common law defenses into Section 1983. Nor have developments subsequent to Reconstruction made the canon any more applicable to the Civil Rights Act of 1871.

A. Scholarly Treatment of the Derogation Canon

For more than a century, the Derogation Canon has been subjected to trenchant criticism. Whether viewed as a substantive means to privilege common law because of its superiority to statutory law or as a tool for discerning legislative intent, commentators have found little to defend. The late Justice Antonin Scalia, writing with Bryan Garner, rejected the canon as “a relic of the courts’ historical hostility to the emergence of statutory law.”105 Notably, Justice Scalia’s view was as common during Reconstruction as it was when he wrote almost 150 years later. Theodore Sedgwick’s influential treatise on interpretation criticized the canon as a creature of the judicial belief that common law was “the perfection of human wisdom,” to be jealously guarded against parliamentary intrusion.106 In Sedgwick’s view, “modern courts and judges” should realize that the doctrine does not account for the “enormous changes in the relations between the courts and the Legislature which have taken place since the rule was promulgated.”107

105. Scalia & Garner, supra note 20, at 318.

If ever the Derogation Canon served a purpose, Sedgwick maintained, it had “entirely passed away” by the mid-nineteenth century. The better rule, per Sedgwick, which courts had coalesced around, was that remedial statutes, even ones in derogation of the common law, should be liberally construed. If the Derogation Canon had any value at all, it was only to protect personal liberty. Otherwise, “the rule has become obsolete; the form of verbal reasoning which once supported it has vanished; and the rule itself should be abolished.”
The first American treatise on negligence law, written shortly before the Civil War and republished during Reconstruction, also advanced this position.

Even treatise authors who were more generous to the canon, and who saw it as a means to discern unclear legislative intent, such as Sir Fortunatus Dwarris, opined that statutes that are directed to “public utility” (by which Dwarris seems to mean the general public welfare) “ought to receive the most liberal and benign interpretation, in accordance with the maxim ut res magis valet quam pereat.” Dwarris recognized that, where legislation addressed an issue not covered by the common law, as did Section 1893, determining the ends

108. Sedgwick, supra note 106, at 270.
109. Id. As one example, the second edition of Sedgwick’s treatise argued that the Married Women’s Property Acts, which were adopted in many jurisdictions in the mid-nineteenth century to expand the property rights of married women, should be applied “fairly and reasonably according to its spirit” because of their remedial nature. Id. at 271.
110. Id. (“To this extent the rule is in the highest degree valuable, not because such statutes ‘are in derogation of the common law,’ but because they oppose the overwhelming power of the government to the feeble power of resistance of the individual, and it is the duty of courts under such circumstances to guard the individual as far as is just and legal, or, in other words, to preserve the individual from having his personal rights taken away by any means that are not strictly legal.”).
111. Id. at 271. See also id. at 274 (“It would appear, therefore, that the doctrine that statutes in derogation of the common law are to be strictly construed, has now truly no solid foundation in our jurisprudence; and, though it will long, no doubt, be familiar to the forensic ear, that there is really no reason whatever why the innovating statutes of our day should be regarded with any peculiar severity.”).
112. See Thomas G. Shearman & Amasa A. Redfield, Treatise on the Law of Negligence § 300, at 367–68 (1st ed. 1869) (arguing that wrongful death statutes which provided causes of action unknown at common law “should be liberally construed in furtherance of [their] object, which is to prevent wrongdoers from escaping through the death of their victims”). As one court explained, even if instantaneous death extinguished a wrongful death cause of action at common law, this limitation did not survive the passage of a wrongful death statute. Murphy v. N.Y. & N.H.R. Co., 30 Conn. 184, 188 (1861).
113. Although Dwarris was not American, his treatise was also considered influential in the United States in the nineteenth century. Richard A. Danner, Justice Jackson’s Lament: Historical and Comparative Perspectives on the Availability of Legislative History, 13 Duke J. Comp. & Int’l L. 151, 114. Sir Fortunatus Dwarris, A General Treatise on Statutes, 203 n.20 (1871). See also id. at 186 (“When a statute alters the common law, the meaning shall not be strained beyond the words, except in cases of public utility . . . .”). The maxim Dwarris referred to is Latin for the proposition that it is better for a thing to have effect than to be made void. Although Dwarris did not define what is encompassed by statutes directed to “public utility,” in other parts of his treatise he appeared to distinguish between laws which are in the public interest and laws which are meant to favor “particular individuals.” See id. at 141 (summarizing “Domat’s Rules” of interpretation); id. at 405 (in the context of takings of private property, referring to “[t]he support of government, and other objects of public utility promoted by taxation . . . .”).
of the act can be discovered “from the cause or necessity of making the act; hence the direction to inquire into the mischief against which the common law had not provided.”

J.G. Sutherland’s 1891 treatise on statutory interpretation, like Dwarris’s, gave the canon some credence. But consistent with the case law summarized below, the treatise focused on statutes that “take away a common-law right, remove or add to common-law disabilities, or provide for proceedings unknown . . . to [the common law].” Sutherland included numerous cites at each point, but did not discuss common law defenses; his focus instead was on common law “rights” and “proceedings.” The former included property rights and rights of action, while the latter principally referred to common law rules of evidence.

Twentieth century commentators were no more enamored with the Derogation Canon. Roscoe Pound, writing in 1908, recognized its obsolescence and its grounding in an era of judicial supremacy. He defended it in limited application, such as to guide courts away from giving a statute an interpretation that would make it unconstitutional. Beyond that, he wrote, “it is without excuse and is merely an incident of the general attitude of courts toward legislation.” From Pound’s perspective, the canon’s survival was rooted in “judicial jealousy of the reform movement; and . . . it is wholly inapplicable to and out of place in American law of today.”

Pound observed that for centuries, Roman law recognized that written text was the default, with common law “a mere makeshift to which men resorted for want of enactment to prevent a failure of justice.” According to Pound, judge-made law overtook this tradition in England around the seventeenth century, in

---

115. Id. at 186. Samuel Bray argued that the “mischief rule” has been widely misunderstood but that it serves two useful purposes: (1) it helps provide a justification for how broadly to interpret the statutory text; and (2) it helps advance interpretations that “prevent a clever evasion that would perpetuate the mischief.” Samuel L. Bray, The Mischief Rule, 109 GEO. L.J. 967, 970 (2021).

117. See id. at 510–13.

118. See id.

119. See also Sinclair, supra note 24, at 939–40 (describing the weakening of support for canon since the turn of the twentieth century).

120. Pound, supra note 18, at 387.

121. Id.

122. Id. at 388. See also Charles D. Breitel, The Lawmakers, 65 COLUM. L. REV. 749, 772 (1965) (describing common law as “based on reasoning and presupposes . . . that its determinations are justified only when explained or explainable in reason”); Daniel A. Farber & Philip P. Frickey, In the Shadow of the Legislature: The Common Law in the Age of the New Public Law, 89 MICH. L. REV. 875, 875 (1991) (“A century ago, statutes were considered intrusions into the pristine order of the common law”); Thomas C. Grey, Langdell’s Orthodoxy, 45 U. PITT. L. REV. 1, 33–35 (1983) (discussing “conservative” position of judges between 1870 to 1940 that “common law private rights were constitutionally protected against collective interference unless the legislation could be shown to be closely related to the accepted police power goals of health, safety, or morals”).

123. Pound, supra note 18, at 388–89.
large part due to the relative “paucity” of legislation.\(^{124}\) This, combined with the tradition of judicial review for unconstitutionality in the United States, led to a conception of the statute as “something exceptional and more or less foreign to the body of legal rules in which legislation had endeavored to insert it.”\(^{125}\) In Pound’s view, if the canon was ever justified, it was when the courts stood between the individual and the Crown and “protected the individual from the state when he required that protection.”\(^{126}\) When deployed against legislation enacted by popularly elected body, however, that justification was less compelling.\(^{127}\) And to the extent that modern authors have located in the canon a notice-based justification for those who face new standards of liability,\(^{128}\) it would be difficult to conclude that state actors were deprived of that notice with passage of the Reconstruction Acts.

Writing decades after Pound, shortly before the Supreme Court decided Tenney, Jefferson B. Fordham and J. Russell Leach examined the Derogation Canon anew and came to a similar conclusion as prior commentators.\(^{129}\) Although Fordham and Leach differed somewhat with Pound as to whether the canon was a uniquely American construct,\(^{130}\) they shared his view that it was indefensible as a general matter.\(^{131}\) As they observed, even if some common law principles might withstand scrutiny better than some statutory innovations, that does not establish common law’s presumptive superiority to statutory law.\(^{132}\) In short, over the course of 150 years, commentators have cast doubt on the utility of the Derogation Canon, particularly as applied to remedial statutes such as Section 1983.

B. The Derogation Canon in Nineteenth-Century Caselaw

Critical commentary aside, the Derogation Canon was influential at times, beginning in the late eighteenth century and leading up to Reconstruction. The United States Supreme Court first adverted to the canon in 1797 in Brown v. Barry,\(^{133}\) a case in which the defendant argued that a claim on a debt, authorized by a Virginia statute passed in 1748, was not viable because the Virginia legislature had subsequently repealed the 1748 act.\(^{134}\) The Supreme Court’s resolution of this issue was complex, but turned in part on its holding that a 1789

\(^{124}\) Id. at 389.

\(^{125}\) Id. at 390.

\(^{126}\) Id. at 403–04.

\(^{127}\) Id. See also Ernest Bruncken, The Common Law and Statutes, 29 YALE L.J. 516, 520 (1920) (suggesting that the Derogation Canon was best understood as a direction that courts should read statutes as in pari materia, or of the same matter, with common law principles).

\(^{128}\) Sinclair, supra note 24, at 939.

\(^{129}\) Fordham & Leach, supra note 19, at 440.

\(^{130}\) Id. at 440–41.

\(^{131}\) Id. at 441–44 (reviewing and refuting justifications for Derogation Canon).

\(^{132}\) Id.

\(^{133}\) 3 U.S. 365, 367–68 (1797).

\(^{134}\) Id.
Virginia law should be construed strictly inasmuch as it was “in derogation of the common law.” By giving the 1789 statute a limited construction, the Court held that the 1748 statute was still in effect and therefore authorized the plaintiff’s claim. Thus, from the outset, the Court used the canon to amplify common law claims, not common law defenses.

A review of each and every Supreme Court decision addressing the canon in the decades after Brown shows that the Court occasionally relied upon the canon in three categories of cases: (1) those involving novel procedural devices; (2) those involving statutes that arguably interfered with common law property rights; and (3) those in which, as in Brown, a plaintiff sought to bring a common law claim that the defendant argued had been displaced by a statute. But none of the case law leading up to and surrounding Reconstruction would have given legislators any indication that courts would sub silentio incorporate common law defenses into a newly created cause of action like Section 1983.

In the early nineteenth century, most cases applying the canon fell into the first category. For example, lawyers argued—without success—that statutes authorizing so-called “summary proceedings” should be strictly construed because they were in tension with common law procedures that provided for a more fulsome hearing. The canon also was implicated in cases concerning the process by which judgment was executed, or the ability to bring joint actions. As procedural rules evolved, the Court confronted arguments that

135. Id. at 367.
136. Id.
137. To unearth and synthesize every relevant decision, I searched Westlaw’s database of Supreme Court opinions for different formulations of the Derogation Canon, including: (1) derogate! /s “common law”; (2) “common law” /s default /p legislat!; and (3) presum! /s “common law” /p legislat!.
138. During this time period, courts defended common law in the criminal context as well, objecting to a turn toward constitutions and statutes as if they “abol[i]shed . . . every rule of action preceding it, and the commencing life anew, without the benefit of a single practical lesson of wisdom derived from our predecessors, or even from ourselves,” State v. Danforth, 3 Conn. 112, 114 (1819).
139. See, e.g., Peyton v. Brooke, 7 U.S. 92, 96 (1805) (displaying argument by counsel that canon applied to procedure of summary proceeding by motion); Stuart v. Laird, 5 U.S. 299, 301–02 (1803) (containing argument by counsel that canon applied to Virginia law providing summary remedy); Wilson v. Mason, 5 U.S. 45, 54 (1801) (featuring argument by counsel that statute regarding summary proceeding should be strictly construed).
141. Fullerton v. Bank of U.S., 26 U.S. 604, 607 (1828) (showing argument by counsel that canon applied to ability to bring joint action “against several persons, on several distinct and dissimilar contracts”).
such rules, whether they be of evidence, discovery, or jurisdiction, should be strictly construed when in derogation of common law procedures. In some cases, these arguments held sway and in others they were rejected, but none of these cases concerned common law defenses. Rather, the upshot of these cases was that litigants could claim some legitimate reliance interest in the expectation that common law procedures would be followed. Notwithstanding the occasional case in which the Derogation Canon held sway, as statutory law proliferated over the course of the nineteenth century, the Supreme Court gave greater consideration to indications that legislators intended procedural innovation. In Metropolitan Railroad Co. v. Moore, for example, the Court considered whether newly enacted statutes reorganizing the courts of the District of Columbia (D.C.) should be read to abrogate the prior practice in D.C. prohibiting certain appeals from denials of motions to set aside a verdict. The lower court had held that no appeal could be brought because the practice in D.C. prior to the new act would have been to dismiss for lack of jurisdiction an appeal of a denial of a motion based on “insufficient evidence.” The Supreme Court acknowledged that this had been the practice in D.C. and Maryland prior to the reorganization of the D.C. courts, but held that the canon disapproving interpretations in derogation of common law principles was inappropriate because (1) Congress had meant to introduce into D.C. a “new organization of its judicial system” modeled on New York’s judiciary and (2) therefore Congress meant to adopt the laws of New York with respect to this question, which would

143. Shutte v. Thompson, 82 U.S. 151, 161 (1872) (applying canon in context of discovery – strictly construing statute regarding formalities necessary to take a deposition); Harris v. Wall, 48 U.S. 693, 704 (1849) (same); Bell v. Morrison, 26 U.S. 351, 355–56 (1828) (same).

145. In Turner, for example, the Court rejected application of the canon, giving the statute a reasonable construction even though it was “penal” and in derogation of the common law. 5 U.S. at 121. In Gilpin v. Page, the Court discussed the canon in the context of service of process, with the Court strictly construing a statute that authorized constructive service by publication in place of personal service, because “every principle of justice exacts a strict and literal [compliance] with the statutory provisions.” 85 U.S. 350, 369–70 (1873).

146. This could carry with it some implicit expectation that legislators will give clear and adequate notice when they mean to displace the common law. See, e.g., Sinclair, supra note 24, at 939 (arguing that if Derogation Canon “has any continuing force, it is on its alternative justification, the principle of notice”). Given how sharply the Reconstruction Acts meant to displace existing relationships between state actors and federal power, however, see infra notes 224–226, and how broadly legislators understood Section 1873 to apply, see infra notes 247–250, state officers had adequate notice that the Civil Rights Act of 1871 required adherence to constitutional norms.

147. 121 U.S. 558 (1887).

148. Id. at 564.
permit the appeal.\textsuperscript{149} By 1887, then, the Supreme Court accepted that legislatures could innovate in contravention of common law expectations about procedure.

The second category of cases in which the Derogation Canon played a role implicated reliance interests more directly: those involving common law property rights and their interaction with statutory innovations. One of the first cases to rely on the canon in this way was the 1812 decision in \textit{Fairfax’s Devisee v. Hunter’s Lessee},\textsuperscript{150} in which the Court held that a Virginia statute should not be read to extinguish a common law claim to title in real property. The most odious of these cases is \textit{Prigg v. Pennsylvania}, in which the Court held unconstitutional a Pennsylvania law prohibiting enslaved people from being taken out of the state and returned into slavery.\textsuperscript{151} Although the opinion focused on the effect of the Fugitive Slave Act of 1793 and the U.S. Constitution’s Fugitive Slave Clause, the Court also adverted to the common law right of a slaveowner to seek a remedy for the “wrongful[]” detention of enslaved people.\textsuperscript{152} But even in less significant cases, counsel argued that statutes implicating property rights should be strictly construed.\textsuperscript{153}

These first two categories of cases were the ones that occupied the field for the vast majority of the nineteenth century. Prior to Reconstruction, the Court also invoked the canon, though rarely, in a third kind of case which also implicated reliance interests: those in which a statute interfaced with common law rights of action. During this time the Court never even hinted, let alone held, that common law defenses are incorporated into statutory causes of action absent express legislative direction to the contrary. Indeed, though not concerning an affirmative defense, \textit{United States v. Stansbury}\textsuperscript{154} is an early example of the Court declining to incorporate a common law barrier to relief even where Congress was silent on the issue. The case involved an action of debt brought by the United States against the debtor and his two sureties. The United States had agreed to release the debtor from prison pursuant to a statute that authorized the Treasury to discharge a debtor from imprisonment upon receiving a conveyance of the debtor’s estate for the benefit of the United States.\textsuperscript{155} At common law, the voluntary release of a debtor from custody constituted a release of the judgment

\textsuperscript{149} Id. at 570–72.
\textsuperscript{150} 11 U.S. 603, 622–23 (1812).
\textsuperscript{151} 41 U.S. 539, 625–26 (1842).
\textsuperscript{152} Id. at 613. It is noteworthy that Pennsylvania’s Attorney General argued in vain that the slave states’ summary proceedings authorizing recapture of enslaved people should be strictly construed as in derogation of the common law. Id. at 600 (argument by counsel).
\textsuperscript{153} McCool v. Smith, 66 U.S. 459, 470–71 (1861) (applying canon in context of validity of title necessary for commencement of ejectment action); Wheaton v. Peters, 33 U.S. 591, 599 (1834) (showing argument by counsel that constitutional provision which takes away a “private right” or property should be strictly construed); Clarke’s Lessee v. Courtney, 30 U.S. 319, 329–30 (1831) (displaying argument by counsel that canon should apply to statute regarding relinquishing title to land to the commonwealth).
\textsuperscript{154} 26 U.S. 573, 575–76 (1828).
\textsuperscript{155} Id. at 575.
itself, meaning that a creditor could not seek a remedy from the surety of the released debtor. The sureties in Stansbury argued that, given that the United States had voluntarily released the creditor from custody, as a matter of common law the government was barred from proceeding against the sureties. The Court rejected that argument because the statute’s language made clear that its purpose was to discharge the debtor from custody, while the judgment against the debtor remained valid and capable of being satisfied in the future. That the statute was silent as to the common law’s treatment of sureties was of no moment, especially because the common law rule was “occasioned by a technical rule, originating in remote ages; which has never been applied to a statutory discharge of the person.”

While one can find stray comments in the Court’s decisions that caution against presuming a statute makes “any alteration in the common law, further or otherwise, than the act expressly declares,” these did not arise in the context of common law defenses but in the context of claims or rights that existed at common law. The Supreme Court’s 1834 decision in Wheaton v. Peters, in which the Court rejected the argument that a statute had any discernable impact on a common law right, was to this effect. This is the context in which the Court’s general language that “[s]tatutes are not presumed to make any alteration in the common law, further or otherwise, than the act expressly declares” originated. The Court was unwilling to read a statute to “restrain” a “thing” (which the Court described interchangeably as a right) that exists at common law absent express language. This rationale lines up with the case law of the time, in that it recognized the reliance interests implicated when a statute interferes with a res, be it property or a cause of action. Defenses, by contrast, were not conceived of as “rights” deserving of protection from derogation.

In late nineteenth-century cases, arising both during and after Reconstruction, the Supreme Court’s Derogation Canon cases increasingly arose in this third setting: those involving the relationship between statutes and common law rights of action. The issue usually presented in either of two forms:

---

156. Id.
157. Id.
158. Id. at 575–76.
159. Id. at 575.
160. 33 U.S. 591, 692 (1834).
161. Id.
162. Id.
163. Modern due process cases are consistent with this insight, inasmuch as the Court has explicitly recognized that a “cause of action is a species of property protected by the Fourteenth Amendment’s Due Process Clause.” Logan v. Zimmerman Brush Co., 455 U.S. 422, 428 (1982) (citing Mullane v. Cent. Hanover Bank & Trust Co., 339 U.S. 306 (1950)).
164. See, e.g., SHEARMAN & REDFIELD, supra note 112, at 367–68 (arguing that wrongful death statutes, which provided a remedy for instantaneous death, did not run afoul of derogation canon because they were not in derogation of a claim, even though at common law the immediacy of death would have been a defense against the claim); Murphy v. New York & N.H.R. Co., 30 Conn. 184, 188 (1861).
cases in which a defendant alleged that a statute had operated to displace a common law claim; or cases in which the parties interpreted statutes that created remedies and rights of action.

As to the first, the Court relied on the canon to generally preserve common law claims for relief, in the absence of express words to the contrary in the statute. Illustrative of the approach to common law rights is Meister v. Moore, where the Court held that a marriage was valid even though it was not solemnized before a minister or magistrate, as required by Michigan law. The Court noted that at common law, marriage is a contract that can be formed “per verba de prasenti,” and that if a statute is to “take away a common-law right,” it must do by plain expression. In the Court’s view, a statute that merely directs marriages to be performed in the presence of certain people should not be construed to be a declaration that no marriage is valid unless performed in this way.

In 1879, the Supreme Court applied the canon along the same lines in the context of the rights against misappropriation of personal property other than money. In Shaw, the statute in question had made bills of lading negotiable in the same manner as bills of exchange. One of the parties maintained that this abrogated common law rights of action for misappropriation of personal property. The party argued that a purchaser of a bill of lading for cotton had a right to the cotton even if the purchaser had reason to believe that the seller did not have a right to sell it (in the actual case, the bill of lading had been stolen from the bank which was the legitimate holder of the bill of lading). But the Court rejected that contention based on the Derogation Canon. The Court held that simply because the statute treated bills of exchange and bills of lading similarly for purposes of negotiability, it did not follow that they should be treated the same for all other purposes (namely, rights that arose out of misappropriation).

Cases like Shaw and Meister are consistent with the pre-1871 case law involving statutory displacement of common law rights or property interests. While these cases signify the Supreme Court’s concern that statutes not unduly undermine preexisting rights, they do not speak to the Derogation Canon’s

---

165. The Main v. Williams, 152 U.S. 122, 132–33 (1894) (holding that statutes should be construed to derogate the rights of claimants as little as possible and holding that, in the absence of express words to the contrary, the statute would not be construed to limit shipowner’s right to damages).
166. 96 U.S. 76, 79 (1877).
167. Loosely translated as “words of present assent.” Id. at 79.
168. Id. at 78–79.
169. Id. (“A statute may declare that no marriages shall be valid unless they are solemnized in a prescribed manner; but such an enactment is a very different thing from a law requiring all marriages to be entered into in the presence of a magistrate or a clergyman, or that it be preceded by a license, or publication of banns, or be attested by witnesses.”).
171. Id. at 560–61 (summarizing argument of counsel).
172. Id. relevance to common law defenses, which did not implicate reliance interests. As the Supreme Court explained in 1885, when it held that a statute of limitations defense was not a “property” right protected by the Fourteenth Amendment, even if the “most liberal extension” of the meaning of property could include “chooses in action” or “incorporeal rights,” property could not encompass a defense to pay a judgment.\footnote{Campbell v. Holt, 115 U.S. 620, 629 (1885) (“We are unable to see how a man can be said to have property in the bar of the statute as a defense to his promise to pay.”) (emphasis in original).}

Cases of the second sort involved the relationship between statutes and the common law where a statute created a new type of right for enforcement. The Court initially vacillated between the canon that remedial statutes should be broadly construed and the canon that statutes that enforce a right unknown at common law should be “followed with strictness.”\footnote{Ross v. Jones, 89 U.S. 576, 591 (1874); Prather v. Reeve, 23 Kan. 627, 629 (1880) (“When a statute creates a liability, and gives a right not known to the common law, such statute at the same time giving a specific mode for the assertion of the right, as a rule that mode and that alone must be pursued.”); Lease v. Vance, 28 Iowa 509, 511 (1870) (interpreting statute concerning obligations to erect, maintain, or contribute to a partition fence). For a discussion of the tension between the Derogation Canon and the canon that remedial statutes should be broadly construed, see sources cited at supra note 24.} An example of such strict construction can be found in \textit{Ross v. Jones}.\footnote{Id. at 591–92.} There the Court applied the canon in the context of remedies against endorsers of a negotiable instrument, noting that “[r]emedies of a statutory character, where the right to be enforced was unknown at the common law, are to be followed with strictness, both as to the methods to be pursued and the cases to which they are to be applied.”\footnote{White v. Cotzhausen, 129 U.S. 329, 341–42 (1889) (construing statute concerning assignment of property to creditors) (quoting R.R. Co. v. Dunn, 52 Ill. 260, 263 (1869)).} \textit{Ross}’s logic could arguably apply to Section 1983, given that it also created a right unknown at common law, but nothing in \textit{Ross} suggested that strictly construing a statutory right encompasses incorporating common law defenses. Fifteen years after \textit{Ross}, however, the Court adopted a more liberal frame in interpreting remedial statutes, stating the “rule [that] though it may be in derogation of the common law, \ldots everything is to be done in advancement of the remedy that can be done consistently with any fair construction that can be put upon it.”\footnote{Sinclair, supra note 24, at 943.}

Section 1983 would appear to be secure in its status as a “remedial” statute, meant to be construed broadly. As Michael Sinclair summarized the relevant jurisprudence, “[i]f the statute is seen not as imposing a restriction or right or duty on the common law, but as fixing it to cover a new situation or an otherwise unforeseen problem, then it is remedial.”\footnote{Sinclair, supra note 24, at 943.} Construing remedial statutes liberally meant, in Sutherland’s words, “to give effect to it according to the intention of the law-maker, as indicated by its terms and purposes.”179 Section 1983 was enacted as part of a transformative moment in the United States, hardly an example of reinscribing common law principles.180

To sum up, the Supreme Court’s use of the Derogation Canon up until and contemporaneously with the Reconstruction Congress betrayed no suggestion that it would incorporate common law defenses into new statutory causes of action, absent express legislative direction to the contrary. If we take seriously the Court’s declaration that its interpretation of Section 1983 is guided by the understanding of the Reconstruction Congress when it enacted the statute,181 it follows that the Court should not rely on the Derogation Canon that legislators at the time would not have expected to apply to Section 1983.

C. The Derogation Canon from the Twentieth Century to the Present

Even after Reconstruction, the Derogation Canon has rarely worked to limit the reach of statutory causes of action, other than in the context of Section 1983. Carrying through nineteenth-century principles, the Court has expressed particular reluctance to rely on the canon in cases involving remedial statutes like Section 1983.182 In the context of legislation in aid of seamen, for example, the Court referenced the canon but then said that remedial legislation should be interpreted so as to “effect its purpose . . . to improve the lot of seamen.”183 The Court struck a similar tone in broadly interpreting a statute providing remedies to a railway worker, arguably in derogation of the common law, because the statute indicated an intent by Congress to change existing law; the statute was also remedial in nature and therefore entitled to a broad construction.184

Of course, the Court has sometimes had to resolve tension between the Derogation Canon and the need to effectuate legislative intent to change policy.

179. SUTHERLAND, supra note 116, at 531; Gibson v. Jenney, 15 Mass. 205, 206 (1818) (adverting to Derogation Canon but deciding that purpose of the statute—to protect the very poor by allowing a family one cow and one swine exempt from process—would not be served if the family could not eat their slaughtered pig).

180. Sinclair, supra note 24, at 946 (“[W]hether a judge applies Thrust #2 [derogation canon] or Parry #2 [remedial canon] depends very greatly on whether the judge sees the statute as solving a problem in the common law or imposing legislatively upon it.”).

181. Writing in dissent, Justice Rehnquist explained that the Court had looked to state court decisions at the time Section 1983 was enacted because “[m]embers of the 42d Congress were lawyers, familiar with the law of their time. In resolving ambiguities in the enactments of that Congress, as with other Congresses, it is useful to consider the legal principles and rules that shaped the thinking of its Members.” Smith v. Wade, 461 U.S. 30, 65–66 (1983) (Rehnquist, J., dissenting).

184. Johnson v. S. Pac. Co., 196 U.S. 1, 16–19 (1904). See also Jamison v. Encarnacion, 281 U.S. 635, 640 (1930) (“The rule that statutes in derogation of the common law are to be strictly construed does not require such an adherence to the letter as would defeat an obvious legislative purpose or lessen the scope plainly intended to be given to the measure.”).
But in line with nineteenth-century case law, this tension has arisen in the context of concerns about abrogating common law claims, not defenses. Thus, the Court has applied the canon to salvage common law rights of action in a broad range of claims, from eminent domain\(^{185}\) to agent liability,\(^{186}\) negligence,\(^{187}\) and excessive charges.\(^{188}\)

The Court also has had occasion to decide a slightly different question: whether to interpret a statute to create a cause of action that had been expressly rejected under the common law. Here, too, the Court has taken a similar approach to the question of whether statutes should be read to abrogate common law rights: read the statute closely for an indication whether the legislature intended to create a new right of action. In City of Detroit v. Osborne,\(^{189}\) the Court confronted a case in which the plaintiff argued that there was a right of action against Detroit for failure to properly maintain a sidewalk. No common law right had ever been recognized in Michigan for any liability arising from the government’s failure to properly maintain streets and the like, but in 1879, the Michigan Legislature passed an Act which permitted claims for damages for defective highways, streets, bridges, crosswalks, and culverts. The plaintiff argued that this statute should be construed to permit a cause of action for defective sidewalks, but the Court held that “a statutory liability created in derogation to common law cannot be enlarged by construction.”\(^{190}\) The Court also noted that because the Act omitted sidewalks, it “left the law in respect to sidewalks not in repair as it was before.”\(^{191}\) The Court took a similar approach in interpreting a statute creating stockholder liability.\(^{192}\) State courts also made use of the canon in this way.\(^{193}\)

By contrast, there are very few cases, other than those involving immunities and Section 1983, in which the Court even considered the argument that a common law defense must be incorporated as part of a new statutory \(^{186}\) Robert C. Herd & Co., Inc. v. Krawill, 359 U.S. 297, 304–09 (1959) (rejecting the argument that two federal statutes should be interpreted to limit the common law right of action against an agent for his negligence).

\(^{189}\) 135 U.S. 492, 495–96 (1890).

\(^{190}\) Id. (cleaned up).

\(^{191}\) Id.

\(^{192}\) Brunswick Terminal Co. v. Nat’l Bank of Baltimore, 192 U.S. 386, 388–90 (1904) (applying canon to narrowly construe a statute regarding liability of a stockholder). See also Michigan Cent. R.R. Co. v. Vreeland, 227 U.S. 59, 63–74 (1913) (holding that where Congress legislates pursuant to its enumerated power, it displaces state limitations on common law tort liability).

\(^{193}\) Devers v. City of Scranton, 161 A. 540 (Pa. 1932) (applying canon in context of claim for damages for negligence in operation of city fire truck).
enforcement scheme. And when the Court has taken up the question, it has not applied a presumption in favor of the common law. In Isbrandtsen Co. v. Johnson, for example, decided fifteen years prior to Pierson, the Court rejected the argument that a common law set-off defense was available against a seaman’s claim for earned wages. The defense was not “prescribed, recognized or permitted” by federal maritime legislation which, because it was remedial in nature, had to be construed liberally in favor of the seamen it was designed to protect. The Court therefore recognized the Derogation Canon but also held that it had no force in remedial legislation.

To the same effect, in United States v. Gilman, the Court rejected application of common law indemnification rules in the Federal Tort Claims Act (FTCA) context. In Gilman, the United States sought to recover damages from its employee that the Government had paid to a tort victim pursuant to the FTCA. The Government argued that at common law, an employer could seek to be indemnified when its employee’s wrongdoing leads to tort liability. And because the FTCA makes the Government liable as if it were a private party, the Government reasoned, the common law rule of indemnity should apply the same to the United States as to a private party. The Court rejected this argument, holding that the question implicated fiscal policy, employee morale, and

---

194. For these purposes, I have omitted discussion of application of the canon in criminal cases, in which the Derogation Canon functions like a cousin to the rule of lenity. H. Hackfeld & Co. v. United States, 197 U.S. 442, 450–53 (1905) (describing the “well known rule” that penal statutes are to be strictly construed in favor of the accused); In re Swan, 150 U.S. 637, 649 (1893) (in habeas corpus action, describing exercise of authority to seize liquors without a warrant as in derogation of a common law right, and therefore to be exercised only “where it is clearly authorized by the statute or rule of law which warrants it”). In United States v. Sanges, for example, the Court applied it in favor of a defendant in a criminal case, holding that it would not interpret a statute conferring appellate jurisdiction to confer upon the United States the right to appeal a criminal case “after judgment below in favor of the defendant.” 144 U.S. 310, 323 (1892) (“It is impossible to presume an intention on the part of congress to make so serious and far-reaching an innovation in the criminal jurisprudence of the United States.”). The Court based its decision on the long common law tradition, both from England and the several states. Id. at 311–12. And in Bell v. Maryland, 378 U.S. 226 (1964), the Court held that there was a “substantial possibility” that Maryland’s highest court would apply the common law presumption in favor of reversing pending criminal charges upon the legislative abolition of a crime, notwithstanding a general savings clause that might be read in tension with the common law rule, because of the Derogation Canon. Id. at 232–34 (remanding to state’s highest court to decide whether common law presumption should be overcome). That said, even in the criminal context, common law defenses are unavailable where the Court determines that legislation “leave[s] no doubt” that the defense is inapplicable. See United States v. Oakland Cannabis Buyers’ Co op., 532 U.S. 483, 491–95 (2001) (holding that necessity defense is unavailable in prosecution under Controlled Substances Act).

196. Id. at 781–82.

197. Id. at 783 (“Marine legislation, at least since the Shipping Commissioners Act of June 7, 1872, 17 Stat. 262, should be construed to make effective its design to change the general maritime law so as to improve the lot of seamen.”).

199. Id. at 508–09.
efficiency, counseling in favor of having Congress address the issue explicitly through legislation.\textsuperscript{200}

There are a few twentieth-century examples in which the Court held that the common law applied to bar a statutory action, but they are not comparable to the importation of common law defenses into Section 1983. In one, the Court construed a statute that gave married women the right to sue, separately from their husbands, for breach of contract, protection of property, and to recover injuries for torts committed against them, “as fully as if they were unmarried.”\textsuperscript{201} The question was whether this statute abrogated the common law bar against women suing their husbands for assault and battery. The Court reasoned that had the legislature wished to make such a “radical” intrusion on the common law, it would have been explicit.\textsuperscript{202} Even if one reads Thompson as relating to a common law immunity defense,\textsuperscript{203} the case did not involve interpretation of a statute like Section 1983 that created a new cause of action.\textsuperscript{204} Slightly more germane, in the intellectual property context, the Court held that Congress intended to retain the “first sale” defense in copyright statutes based in part on that common law doctrine’s “impeccable historic pedigree.”\textsuperscript{205} But the Court reached this conclusion after first considering the statute’s text and evidence of legislative intent—it relied on the common law status of the good-faith defense only to confirm the Court’s reading of the text and legislative history.\textsuperscript{206}

More typical is the Court’s decision in \textit{SCA Hygiene Products Aktiebolag v. First Quality Baby Prod., LLC}, which rejected application of a laches defense to a patent infringement claim brought within the statutory limitations period

\begin{footnotesize}
\begin{enumerate}
\item \textsuperscript{200} Id. at 511–12 (“The selection of that policy which is most advantageous to the whole . . . is more appropriately for those who write the laws, rather than for those who interpret them.”).
\item \textsuperscript{202} Thompson, 218 U.S. at 618. State courts addressed the relevance of similar statutes as well, often to different effect. In 1920, the South Carolina Supreme Court, in \textit{Prosser v. Prosser}, 102 S.E. 787 (S.C. 1920), relied primarily on the state’s code of civil procedure to provide a battered wife a tort remedy against her husband, but also cited to the Married Women’s Property Act. \textit{id.} at 788. (“More than this, a wife has a right in her person; and a suit for a wrong to her person is a thing in action; and a thing in action is property, and her property.”).
\item \textsuperscript{203} Carl Tobias has described the Thompson decision in this way, \textit{See Carl Tobias, Interspousal Tort Immunity in America, 23 GA. L. REV. 359, 399 (1989). But as one contemporaneous treatise suggested, the Married Women’s statutes were viewed by many courts as interfering with a husband’s common law property rights. SUTHERLAND, supra note 116, at 511–12.}
\item \textsuperscript{204} 218 U.S. at 615–16 (describing statute that gave married women the right to sue and be sued).
\item \textsuperscript{206} This is consistent with one case referenced in Sutherland’s 1891 treatise in which the court held that a common law defense was not abrogated by statute, but in that case the statute specifically prohibited the defense for an action of trespass on the case but not for a different form of action—the court acknowledged that the defense was not available for the former but declined to interpret the statute as applying to the latter form of action. Melody v. Reab, 4 Mass. 471, 473 (1808) (cited in SUTHERLAND, supra note 116, at 511 n.2).}
\end{enumerate} \end{footnotesize}
under the Patent Act.\textsuperscript{207} The Court entertained the defendant’s argument that some pre-Patent Act cases in lower federal courts recognized, in dictum, the possibility that laches could be a defense against a damages action for infringement.\textsuperscript{208} But it rejected the argument and held that Congress had determined that laches should not apply by setting a specific limitations period.\textsuperscript{209} Even assuming \textit{arguendo} that Congress legislated with common law in the background, the Court reasoned that the weight of common law authority indicated that laches did not apply to damages claims.\textsuperscript{210}

Other recent cases also suggest the Court’s misadventure in \textit{Pierson}. The Court has emphasized that if the Derogation Canon has any meaning, it is in areas of law where a statute “clearly covers a field formerly governed by the common law.”\textsuperscript{211} It has held that even where there is overlap between statutory coverage and the common law—say, in RICO claims and common law fraud claims—there is no presumption that common law limitations should apply to newly created statutory causes of action.\textsuperscript{212} The Court has found that Congress’s intent, not just its words, can displace common law doctrines of preclusion.\textsuperscript{213} And it has held that the Derogation Canon is most concerned with common law rights, not defenses.\textsuperscript{214} When the Court has relied on the canon to incorporate common law doctrine outside of common law claims, its cases have concerned

\begin{itemize}
\item \textsuperscript{207} 580 U.S. 328, 342 (2017).
\item \textsuperscript{208} \textit{Id.} at 338–342.
\item \textsuperscript{209} \textit{Id.} at 355.
\item \textsuperscript{210} \textit{Id.} at 344.
\item \textsuperscript{211} \textit{Samanantar v. Yousuf}, 560 U.S. 305, 320 (2010).
\item \textsuperscript{213} \textit{Astoria Fed. Sav. & Loan Ass’n v. Solimino}, 501 U.S. 104, 110 (1991) (rejecting application of common law of preclusion for administrative agency determinations because doing so would be inconsistent with Congress’s intent).
\item \textsuperscript{214} \textit{United States v. Texas}, 507 U.S. 529, 534 (1993) (applying canon to preserve Federal government’s common law right to collect prejudgment interest on debts owed to it by the States); \textit{Midlantic Nat’l Bank v. New Jersey Dep’t of Env’t Prot.}, 474 U.S. 494, 501 (1986) (holding that Congress did not implicitly abrogate common law limitations on bankruptcy trustee’s abandonment power).
\end{itemize}
not defenses but issues such as fee shifting, equitable tolling, causation, the availability of punitive damages, and the scope of coverage of statutory rights. What these cases have in common is that they all relate to the remedial scope and claim construction of statutory rights.

At the same time, the Court has broadly enforced causes of action when— as with Section 1983—legislation expressly creates them, even when the action would not exist at common law. This is how the Court approached the issue in two turn-of-the-century cases concerning the duty of railroads to their employees. The Court recognized that, where Congress was “not satisfied with the common-law duty and its resulting liability,” it could prescribe a new duty by statute. Because Congress created a new statutory obligation, the Court stated that it “need not enter into the wilderness of cases upon the common-law duty of the employer to use reasonable care to furnish his employee reasonably safe tools, machinery, and appliances, or consider when and how far that duty may be performed by delegating it to suitable persons for whose default the employer is not responsible” because the statute, making no mention of these limitations, created an absolute liability.

Consistent with this approach to statutory interpretation, the Court has given Section 1983 and other Reconstruction-era law a broad reading in contexts outside of immunity. In Griffin v. Breckenridge, the Supreme Court read Section 1985(3) as applying to private persons because of the meaning of the words “in their face,” notwithstanding the common understanding that the 216. Lozano v. Montoya Alvarez, 572 U.S. 1, 10–11 (2014) (discussing canon in context of equitable tolling and holding that presumption is that Congress intends for equitable tolling to apply to federal statutory claims). To be sure, although equitable tolling doctrine is related to a statute of limitations defense, it presents an opportunity for a plaintiff to overcome a statute of limitations bar. See, e.g., Pace v. DiGuglielmo, 544 U.S. 408, 418 (2005) (describing general requirements for showing entitlement to equitable tolling). As such, like the other areas in which the Derogation Canon has been applied by the Court, it offers a way of preserving a common law right to seek relief.

---

217. Comcast Corp. v. Nat’l Ass’n of Afr. Am.-Owned Media, 140 S. Ct. 1009, 1014 (2020) (“This ancient and simple ‘but for’ common law causation test, we have held, supplies the ‘default’ or ‘background’ rule against which Congress is normally presumed to have legislated when creating its own new causes of action.”).

218. Atl. Sounding Co. v. Townsend, 557 U.S. 404, 424–25 (2009) (finding that punitive damages are available for general maritime law because they “have long been an accepted remedy under general maritime law, and because nothing in the Jones Act altered this understanding . . .”).

221. Taylor, 210 U.S. at 294 (“There is no escape from the meaning of these words. Explanation cannot clarify them, and ought not to be employed to confuse them or lessen their significance.”); Chicago, B & Q. Ry. Co., 220 U.S. at 574.

Fourteenth Amendment reached only state action. In so doing, the Court noted that its approach with other Reconstruction-era civil rights laws had been to “accord them a sweep as broad as their language.”

The Court also has made clear that it views Section 1983 as marking a break with prior law. The Court has spoken of Section 1983 as part of “the basic alteration in our federal system wrought in the Reconstruction era” and as a “uniquely federal remedy against incursions under the claimed authority of state law upon rights secured by the Constitution.” The Court read the legislative history of Section 1983 as indicating a desire to protect federally created rights against state hostility, including state court hostility. This was the “very purpose” of Section 1983.

To sum up, the Derogation Canon has always stood on shaky footing. But nothing in the Supreme Court’s historical use of the canon supports the direction taken by Pierson and its progeny. Rather than amplifying common law defenses, the canon has almost always been concerned with protecting common law claims or rights. Moreover, where statutes explicitly create rights of action unknown at common law, as with Section 1983, the Derogation Canon falls away. Whether viewed through the current understanding of the canon’s role, or more importantly, through the lens of a Reconstruction legislator, the fundamental premise of the Supreme Court’s qualified immunity jurisprudence has no foundation.

III. THE LOST TEXT OF SECTION 1983

The Supreme Court’s Section 1983 immunity jurisprudence has another failing, however. For even if the Derogation Canon is viable and applicable to remedial statutes like Section 1983, it is something of a clear statement rule:

---

223. Id. at 96 (noting that “going in disguise” is not typically associated with state actors).
226. Id. at 242.
common law should not be displaced by statute, absent explicit command by the legislature. But as I will show in this Section, the Civil Rights Act of 1871 did explicitly abrogate common law immunities. Although the relevant text was never included in the codified version of Section 1983, that omission was a product of the first Reviser of the Federal Statutes’ unauthorized alteration of positive law in the first version of the Revised Statutes in 1874. What’s more, accounting for the original text of Section 1983 makes sense of the legislative history and overall framework of the Civil Rights Act of 1871. The Court’s flawed immunity jurisprudence, by contrast, directly conflicts with those elements of the law.

A. The Civil Rights Act of 1871’s Abrogation of Common Law Defenses

The version of Section 1983 one finds in the United States Code appears silent as to any common law defenses:

Every person who, under color of any statute, ordinance, regulation, custom, or usage, of any State or Territory or the District of Columbia, subjects, or causes to be subjected, any citizen of the United States or other person within the jurisdiction thereof to the deprivation of any rights, privileges, or immunities secured by the Constitution and laws, shall be liable to the party injured in an action at law, suit in equity, or other proper proceeding for redress.

But the Civil Rights Act of 1871 as enacted contained additional significant text, which I call the Notwithstanding Clause. In between the words “shall” and “be liable,” the statute contained the following clause: “any such law, statute, ordinance, regulation, custom, or usage of the State to the contrary notwithstanding.”

And it is a fair inference that this clause meant to encompass state common law principles. Senator Allen G. Thurman, speaking in opposition to Section 1 of the 1871 Act (what is now Section 1983) clearly understood that “custom or usage” was equivalent to “common law.” In other words, the 1871 Congress created liability for state actors who violate federal law, notwithstanding any state law to the contrary.

230. This, after all, was the basis for the Court’s overruling of Swift v. Tyson, 41 U.S. 1 (1842), in Erie R.R. Co. v. Tompkins, 304 U.S. 64 (1938). See also W. Union Tel. Co. v. Call Pub. Co., 181 U.S. 92, 102 (1901) (citing Black’s Law Dictionary for proposition that common law springs from “usages and customs”).
232. One also might think the Supremacy Clause would implicate qualified immunity when state law common law immunities are applied to bar Section 1983 relief. The Supreme Court has addressed the potential conflict by pointing to the “special federal policy considerations” that support qualified immunity. Some scholars, dissatisfied with this explanation, have offered a different account. See James S. Liebman & William F. Ryan, “Some Effectual Power”: The Quantity and Quality of Decisionmaking Required of Article III Courts, 98 Colum. L. Rev. 696, 858–61 (1998) (suggesting that Supremacy Clause issues are not raised by qualified immunity because unconstitutional conduct by state officials is not the equivalent of state “law” and thus does not threaten the supremacy of federal law).
Neither the Supreme Court nor its scholarly critics have ever grappled with the significance of the Notwithstanding Clause for the Court’s immunity jurisprudence. Its implications are unambiguous: state law immunity doctrine, however framed, has no place in Section 1983. On its face, the clause directly undermines Pierson, which incorporated a good-faith immunity into Section 1983 based solely on Mississippi state law. Wood v. Strickland, which expanded Pierson’s qualified immunity to school board officials, also leaned heavily on state common law immunity doctrine.

This is not to say that every common law immunity recognized during the nineteenth century was a creature of state law. The Court’s opinion in Tenney, for example, canvassed British tradition as well as federal and state constitutions to conclude that legislative immunity was deeply enshrined in common law. But the vast majority of immunity doctrine, to the extent it existed at all, was sourced in state law, especially for the state actors who would be subjected to Section 1983 liability. To the extent the Reconstruction Congress even contemplated that these defenses would apply to the Civil Rights Act of 1871, the Notwithstanding Clause would have sufficed to assuage those concerns.

Notably, the distinction between Section 1983 as enacted and as reflected in the United States Code is not the product of any positive lawmaking. Rather, 233. Justice Frankfurter, dissenting in part in Monroe v. Pape, 365 U.S. 167 (1961), stated that the original text, including the Notwithstanding Clause, “clarified the objective to which the provision was addressed.” Id. at 228. Monroe, of course, was announced before the Court adopted a good-faith immunity in Pierson. A handful of other cases have quoted the original text of the Civil Rights Act for other purposes, see, for example, Ngiraingas v. Sanchez, 495 U.S. 182, 188 (1990), Jett v. Dallas Indep. Sch. Dist., 491 U.S. 701, 723 (1989), Examining Bd. of Eng’rs, Architects & Surveyors v. Flores de Otero, 426 U.S. 572, 582 & n.11 (1976), but no opinion, whether for the Court or for individual Justices, has construed the Notwithstanding Clause within the Court’s immunity doctrine or more generally. And multiple opinions have stated that the Reviser’s changes were not meant to alter the scope of the 1871 Civil Rights Act. See Adickes v. S. H. Kress & Co., 398 U.S. 144, 203 n.15 (1970) (Brennan, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part); Hague v. Comm. for Indus. Org., 307 U.S. 496, 510 (1939).

---

235. See 420 U.S. 308, 318–20 & nn.9 & 12 (1975) (collecting state court cases). It summarized those sources as standing for the proposition that absolute immunity was not justified but that a qualified immunity was appropriate. Id. at 320.

237. See, e.g., Scott A. Keller, Qualified and Absolute Immunity at Common Law, 73 STAN. L. REV. 1337, 1368–75 (2021) (surveying Supreme Court doctrine, treatises, and state law supposedly establishing qualified immunity). As Jim Pfander has shown, Keller’s treatment of the common law doctrine is significantly flawed, see Pfander, supra note 84, but even if one accepts Keller’s claims at face value, the federal law he identified relates only to the immunity of federal officers. See Wilkes v. Dinsman, 48 U.S. 89, 129 (1849) (claims against naval commander); Kendall v. Stokes, 44 U.S. 87, 98 (1845) (claims against federal Postmaster); Otis v. Watkins, 13 U.S. 339, 356 (1815) (claims against federal customs inspector); Keller, supra, at 1368–69 (discussing Otis, Kendall, and Wilkes). The remainder of the sources Keller relied on for his claims all are based on state court decisions and treatises summarizing state court decisions. Keller, supra, at 1369–75.

238. See Hague, 307 U.S. at 510 (stating that Reviser’s changes were “not intended to alter the scope” of Section 1983); REVISED STATUTES OF THE UNITED STATES, Preface, at v (1878) (stating that Reviser had no authority to make substantive changes); An Act to Provide for the Preparation and the version of the statute we find in any law library today is the product of a decision by the first Reviser of Federal Statutes to, for unclear reasons, remove the italicized language when the first edition of the Revised Statutes of the United States was published in 1874.239 Although the Revised Statutes were supplemented and corrected over time until the first United States Code was published in 1926,240 the Revisor’s error in omitting the Notwithstanding Clause from the reported version of the Civil Rights Act of 1871 was never corrected.

The many errors contained in the first version of the Revised Statutes prompted consternation, but they nonetheless constitute “legal evidence” of federal law.241 Congress made clear that subsequent versions of the Revised Statutes can be taken only as “prima facie” evidence of the law, which can be rebutted by pointing to the originally enacted version, unless Congress has specifically adopted the codification as part of the laws of the United States.242 Thus, generally speaking, when there is a conflict between the law as codified and the Statutes at Large, the Statutes at Large control.243 Because the first

---

242. See 1 U.S.C. § 204(a) (“The matter set forth in the edition of the Code of Laws of the United States current at any time shall, together with the then current supplement, if any, establish prima facie the laws of the United States, general and permanent in their nature, in force on the day preceding the commencement of the session following the last session the legislation of which is included: Provided, however, That whenever titles of such Code shall have been enacted into positive law the text thereof shall be legal evidence of the laws therein contained, in all the courts of the United States, the several States, and the Territories and insular possessions of the United States.”). Congress has enacted into positive law some of the Titles in the United States Code, but not Title 42, which contained Section 1983. See Office of the Law Revision Counsel, U.S. CODE, https://uscode.house.gov/browse.xhtml [https://perma.cc/9R58-N3VL] (last visited July 15, 2021).
243. See U.S. Nat’l Bank of Or. v. Indep. Ins. Agents of Am., Inc., 508 U.S. 439, 448 (1993) (“Although the appearance of a provision in the current edition of the United States Code is ‘prima facie’ evidence that the provision has the force of law, it is the Statutes at Large that provides the legal evidence of laws.”) (cleaned up); United States v. Welden, 377 U.S. 95, 98 n.4 (1964) (“[T]he very meaning of prima facie is that the Code cannot prevail over the Statutes at Large when the two are inconsistent.”) (cleaned up); Stephan v. United States, 319 U.S. 423, 426 (1943) (“[T]he Code cannot prevail over the Statutes at Large when the two are inconsistent.”). See also Turner v. Glickman, 207 F.3d 419, 428 (7th Cir. 2000) (accord: no weight to placement of provision of Statutes at Large in criminal code because decision was made by reviser); Preston v. Heckler, 734 F.2d 1359, 1367–69 (9th Cir. 1984) (holding Revision, erroneous as it was, is not subject to this limitation, the Notwithstanding Clause is not formally positive law. However, it still speaks powerfully to Congress’s intent that any immunity grounded in state law has no application to the cause of action we now know as Section 1983.

B. The Notwithstanding Clause and the Civil Rights Act of 1871’s History and Structure

Taking account of the Notwithstanding Clause has another virtue—it provides a more coherent account of Section 1983 than the Supreme Court’s immunity jurisprudence. Starting with legislative history, it is nearly impossible to square the Supreme Court’s case law with contemporaneous statements made by Reconstruction lawmakers. Even as to absolute judicial immunity, there is overwhelming evidence that members of Congress were quite conscious of the fact that both the civil and criminal civil rights statutes would displace any judicial immunity. As the plaintiff s in Pierson pointed out, President Andrew Johnson vetoed the Civil Rights Act of 1866 in part because it subjected state judges to criminal liability for civil rights violations; Congress responded by reenacting the Act and specifically stating that judges may be criminally liable. And it is well accepted that the remedies provided in the 1871 Act were meant to work in tandem with the 1866 Act.

Notably, when Congress turned to debating the civil liability components of the 1871 Civil Rights Act, opponents of Section 1983 liability explicitly objected to its imposition of liability on judges and other state officials “for a mere error of judgment.” These opponents understood that officers who make

---

244. Brief for Petitioner at 23–24, Pierson v. Ray, 386 U.S. 547 (1967) (available at 1966 WL 100720) (“All the members of Congress who spoke on the problem, explicitly stated that the section applied to judges. None disagreed.”).

245. Id. at 24; Matasar, supra note 3, at 778 (noting that debate of 1866 Act explicitly focused on lack of immunity for Civil Rights Act of 1866; proposals to mitigate liability for state officials were rejected); CONG. GLOBE, 39th Cong., 1st Sess., 1679, 1780 (1866). Senator Lyman Trumbull, speaking in support of overruling President Johnson’s veto of the 1866 Act, specifically stated that the concept of immunity for judges and other officials was “akin to the maxim of the English law that the King can do no wrong” and “is the very doctrine out of which the rebellion was hatched.” CONG. GLOBE, 39th Cong., 1st Sess. 1758 (1866). See also id. at 1778 (statement of Sen. Reverdy Johnson); id. at 1783 (statement of Sen. Edgar Cowan); id. at 1837 (statement of Rep. William Lawrence).

247. See CONG. GLOBE, 42d Cong., 1st Sess. 365–66 (1871) (statement of Rep. William Arthur) (“Hitherto, in all the history of this country and of England, no judge or court has been held liable, civilly or criminally, for judicial acts, and the ministerial agents of the law have been covered by the same aegis of exemption . . . . Under the provisions of this section, every judge in the State court and every other officer thereof, great or small, will enter upon and pursue the call of official duty with the sword of Damocles suspended over him by a silken thread . . . .”). See also Matasar, supra note 3, at 771 (“The Court’s assumption becomes even more doubtful, however, when the legislative debates of the discretionary decisions would be held liable under Section 1983 notwithstanding their good faith; that was precisely why they opposed it.\(^{248}\) None of the proponents spoke a word of assurance, leaving the implication that opponents had accurately understood the legislation.\(^ {249}\) This history, in combination with the absence of any language in Section 1983 regarding immunity, offers a strong indication that Congress meant to abrogate all common law immunities, even without the Notwithstanding Clause.\(^ {250}\)

Additionally, the legislative record is replete with evidence that supporters of the Civil Rights Act did not trust state courts to protect constitutional rights.\(^ {251}\) Some of the very same people who served in the rebel army were also serving as judges in southern states.\(^ {252}\) It would have been passing strange, then, for the very same Congress to permit liability under Section 1983 to be limited by judge-made law created by state court judges. As Seth Kreimer has argued, given the Civil Rights Act’s purpose to disarm a Confederate State judiciary hostile to Reconstruction, “it seems unlikely that the local common law elaborated by the very judiciary that the federal courts were designed to supersede was to be given primacy.”\(^ {253}\) The Notwithstanding Clause thus both reflects and confirms the 1871 Civil Rights Act’s history and purpose.

This interpretation of Section 1983 had ample support in the courts, at least for the first half of the twentieth century, when it was common for courts to apply

---

248. See Cong. Globe, 42d Cong., 1st Sess. 385 (1871) (statement of Rep. Joseph Lewis) (“By the first section, in certain cases, the judge of a State court, though acting under oath of office, is made liable to a suit in the Federal court and subject to damages for his decision against a suitor, however honest and conscientious that decision may be; and a ministerial officer is subject to the same pains and penalties, though simply executing the process of a State court, about which he has no discretion, and the legality of which he has no right to question.”).

249. Matasar, supra note 3, at 772 (stating that major speeches opposing Section 1983 “proceeded on the assumption that it would apply to all officials—legislators, judges, and executive officers”); id. at 772–75 (reviewing legislative history in which opposition lawmakers pointed out that there was no good-faith immunity in statute and no one reassured them).

250. Id. at 781 (looking to Section 1983 as codified and concluding that “Congress in 1871 meant to abrogate all common law immunities and did so by the plain language of section 1983”). See also Achtenberg, supra note 4, at 502 (pointing out that Section 1983’s language does not support immunity and that legislative history suggests that opponents interpreted Section 1983 as abrogating immunity).

253. Kreimer, supra note 83, at 617.
Section 1983 free of any state law immunities.\textsuperscript{254} Prior to \textit{Pierson} and \textit{Tenney}, even the Supreme Court had affirmed damages awards against state officials on multiple occasions without any mention of common law immunity doctrine.\textsuperscript{255} The Supreme Court’s 1961 decision in \textit{Monroe} gave even more support to those who would read Section 1983 as imposing liability notwithstanding any state law defenses. Indeed, as one post-\textit{Monroe} opinion noted, if a state law immunity displaced liability under Section 1983, it would be inconsistent with \textit{Monroe}’s basic holding that the availability or unavailability of state law remedies is irrelevant to the relief afforded by federal law.\textsuperscript{256}

Excavating the Notwithstanding Clause also sheds additional light on the relevance of 42 U.S.C. § 1988, which authorizes district courts to fills gaps in the Civil Rights Act with state law under certain conditions.\textsuperscript{257} Section 1988 provides authority to “look to principles of the common law, as altered by state law, so long as such principles are not inconsistent with the Constitution and laws of the United States.”\textsuperscript{258} The Court will not deem a state law “inconsistent” with Section 1983’s broad remedial purpose simply because it interferes with a remedy in a given case; the state law must be inconsistent in a more “general” way to be precluded by the exclusionary language of Section 1988.\textsuperscript{259}

---

\textsuperscript{254} Myers v. Anderson, 238 U.S. 368, 371, 380 (1915) (upholding damages action under Section 1983 against election officials without any discussion of good faith, although good faith was raised by defendants); Cobb v. City of Malden, 202 F.2d 701, 705–06 (1st Cir. 1953) (Magnruder, J., concurring) (recognizing Section 1983’s “apparently sweeping and unqualified language”); Burt v. City of New York, 156 F.2d 791, 793 (2d Cir. 1946) (Hand, J.) (opining that Civil Rights Act did not include an immunity defense and concluding that “so far as we can see, any public officer of a state, or of the United States, will have to defend any action brought in a district court . . . in which the plaintiff, however irresponsible, is willing to make the necessary allegations”); Picking v. Pa. R.R. Co., 151 F.2d 240, 250 (3d Cir. 1945), overruled in part by Bauers v. Heisel, 361 F.2d 581 (3d Cir. 1966) (“But the privilege as we have stated was a rule of the common law. Congress possessed the power to wipe it out. We think that the conclusion is irresistible that Congress by enacting the Civil Rights Act sub judice intended to abrogate the privilege to the extent indicated by that act and in fact did so.”).

\textsuperscript{256} Cohen v. Norris, 300 F.2d 24, 33–34 (9th Cir. 1962).

\textsuperscript{257} 42 U.S.C. § 1988; Robertson v. Wegmann, 436 U.S. 584, 592 n.11 (1978) (“[W]hatever the value of nationwide uniformity in areas of civil rights enforcement where Congress has not spoken, in the areas to which § 1988 is applicable Congress has provided direction, indicating that state law will often provide the content of the federal remedial rule.”).

\textsuperscript{258} Moor v. Alameda Cnty., 411 U.S. 693, 703 (1973).

\textsuperscript{259} Robertson, 436 U.S. at 590–94 (“If success of the § 1983 action were the only benchmark, there would be no reason at all to look to state law, for the appropriate rule would then always be the one favoring the plaintiff, and its source would be essentially irrelevant.”). In \textit{Robertson}, the Court found that Louisiana’s survivorship rule, under which certain causes of action abated with death, should be applied in a Section 1983 action but cabined off situations “in which the particular application of state 1988 has been applied to determine what measure of damages to use,\textsuperscript{260} what rules of survivorship apply,\textsuperscript{261} and which statutes of limitations to use—in short, it instructs courts as to the choice of law in actions brought to enforce the substantive provisions of the Civil Rights Act.\textsuperscript{262} Some scholars have grappled with whether Section 1988 provides a vehicle for applying qualified immunity to Section 1983.\textsuperscript{263} But the proviso in Section 1983 omitted by the Reviser answers the question more directly—state law which imposes a barrier to Section 1983 liability was not meant to apply under the proviso, while state law that makes Section 1983 more effective should be applied under Section 1988.\textsuperscript{264} Because the Supreme Court’s qualified immunity jurisprudence is and always has been inconsistent with this concept, it cannot be squared with the text, purpose, or context of the Civil Rights Act of 1871. This conflict persists whether immunity doctrine is the common law version announced by the Court in \textit{Pierson} or the form adopted by the current Court, requiring that a plaintiff show a violation of “clearly established law” to establish Section 1983 liability.

\footnotesize{\textsuperscript{260} Smith \textit{v.} Wade, 461 U.S. 30, 38–51 (1983) (canvassing state and federal common law to determine standard for punitive damages under Section 1983 and noting that “Smith has not shown why § 1983 should give higher protection from punitive damages than ordinary tort law”); see id. at 53–55 (looking to “ordinary tort law” to conclude that there is no rule that “the threshold for punitive damages must always be higher than that for compensatory liability”); Sullivan \textit{v.} Little Hunting Park, Inc., 396 U.S. 229, 230 (1969) (stating that as to measure of damages, “both federal and state rules on damages may be utilized, whichever better serves the policies expressed in the federal statutes . . . . [T]he rule of damages, whether drawn from federal or state sources, is a federal rule responsive to the need whenever a federal right is impaired”). \textit{See also} William H. Theis, Case Commentary, \textit{Shaw \textit{v.} Garrison - Some Observations on 42 U.S.C. § 1988 and Federal Common Law}, 36 La. L. Rev. 681, 686–87 (1976) (arguing that state law resulting in greater damages for Section 1983 cases should be applicable under Section 1988, because “[p]resumably, on the issue of damages in civil rights cases, more is better”).}

\footnotesize{\textsuperscript{261} \textit{Moor}, 411 U.S. at 710 (“Although an injured party’s personal claim was extinguished at common law upon the death of either the injured party himself or the alleged wrongdoer, see W. Prosser, \textit{Torts} 888—891 (4th ed. 1971), it has been held that pursuant to § 1988 state survivorship statutes which reverse the common-law rule may be used in the context of actions brought under § 1983.”).}

\footnotesize{\textsuperscript{262} Id. at 705.}

\footnotesize{\textsuperscript{263} Theis, \textit{supra} note 258, at 684–86. \textit{See also} Coleman, \textit{supra} note 6, at 693 (arguing that Section 1988 should provide guidepost for interpreting Section 1983, meaning that federal law should fill any gaps in Section 1983’s meaning, with the law of the State serving if there is no applicable or suitable federal law, so long as state law is not inconsistent with Section 1983’s purposes). In the context of immunity, Coleman argued that applying Section 1988 would mean that courts would first determine whether any federal law of immunity existed before turning to state law; if state law abrogated immunity this could be applied as consistent with Section 1983; if state law instead provided for absolute immunity, this would be arguably inconsistent with federal law, requiring recourse to federal common law. \textit{Id.} at 733. \textit{See also} Lawrence Rosenthal, \textit{Defending Qualified Immunity}, 72 S.C.L. Rev. 547, 567–71 (2020) (arguing that Section 1988 provides a vehicle for applying qualified immunity to Section 1983 actions via federal common law).}

\footnotesize{\textsuperscript{264} Kreimer, \textit{supra} note 83, at 632 (arguing that state laws that “augment the effectiveness” of Section 1983 should be applied under Section 1988).}
IV. IMPLICATIONS AND OBJECTIONS

Putting Section 1983 into interpretive context and accounting for the enacted text of the Civil Rights Act—thereby minimizing the relevance of the Derogation Canon and putting state law immunities on the sideline where the Reconstruction Congress intended—has many significant implications. First, unlike the scholarship and advocacy that urges the Supreme Court to read Section 1983 as limited by the 1871 understanding of common law immunities, this Article shows that any such immunities have no place in Section 1983 litigation. This is decisive as to the good-faith immunity that the Court has transformed into qualified immunity. To the extent that this immunity existed as a creature of state law in 1871, the Reconstruction Congress made clear it has no place in federal civil rights claims. Moreover, Pierson itself relied only on Mississippi law to support a good-faith defense to Section 1983. Thus, Pierson was and always has been inconsistent with the Civil Rights Act of 1871.

Some might argue that even if state court opinions were the source of the 1871 version of an immunity defense, the “common law” was neither federal nor state in the era of Swift v. Tyson. If so, the argument goes, the Notwithstanding Clause is less relevant, because common law immunities could exist independent of whatever state law was abrogated by the Civil Rights Act of 1871. This argument overlooks the fact that even under Swift, there was a critical distinction between “general” law, which knew no sovereign, and “local” or customary law, which was considered state law. Swift’s “general” law was applied in cases involving commercial relations or in tort cases involving interstate commerce.

265. As to state actors, to the extent any immunity doctrine existed at common law in 1871, the defense was sourced in state law. See supra note 237.
269. Up until 1871, almost every case in which the Supreme Court cited to Swift involved a commercial dispute. See Mich. Bank v. Eldred, 76 U.S. 544 (1869) (promissory note); Butz v. City of Muscatine, 75 U.S. 575 (1869) (bonds); Bd. of Sup’rs of Marshall v. Schenck, 72 U.S. 772 (1866) (bond obligations); Murray v. Lardner, 69 U.S. 110 (1864) (commercial paper); Jefferson Branch Bank v. Skelly, 66 U.S. 436 (1861) (Contract Clause); Bank of Pittsburgh v. Neal, 63 U.S. 96 (1859) (commercial paper); Goodman v. Simonds, 61 U.S. 343 (1857) (promissory notes); Watson v. Tarpley, 59 U.S. 517 (1855) (bill of exchange); Brabston v. Gibson, 50 U.S. 263 (1850) (promissory note); Prentice v. Zane, 49 U.S. 470 (1850) (commercial paper); Nesmith v. Sheldon, 48 U.S. 812 (1849) (corporate status); Cook v. Moffat, 46 U.S. 295 (1847) (contract); Smyth v. Strader, 45 U.S. 404 (1846) (promissory note); Lawrence v. McCalmont, 43 U.S. 426 (1844) (commercial guarantee). There were two additional pre-1871 cases in which Swift was raised, but both involved the construction of a will. Williamson v. Berry, 49 U.S. 495 (1850); Lake v. Vick, 44 U.S. 464 (1845). From 1871 until the Supreme Court’s decision in Erie, nearly every case in which Swift was raised also involved commercial relations. People’s Sav. Bank v. Bates, 120 U.S. 556 (1887) (mortgage obligations); Am. File Co. v. Garrett, 110 U.S. 288 (1884) (bonds); Town of Pana v. Bowler, 107 U.S. 529 (1883) (bonds); Burgess (unsurprisingly, these cases all involved railroads and arose in the late nineteenth century). Outside of these areas, state law, whether statutory or judge-made, governed “[q]uestions of public policy as affecting the liability for acts done . . . within one of the States of the Union,” unless controlled by federal law or by considerations requiring national uniformity such as commercial relations.

More pointedly, cases involving the tort liability of cities and states involved “local” law, according to the Court, making state court decisions on such matters dispositive for the purposes of federal courts. Thus, even in the Swift era, the Notwithstanding Clause, along with the legislative history and overall purpose of the Civil Rights Act, should be read to displace “local” common law immunities.

Even if objectors find a way to minimize the Notwithstanding Clause’s displacement of state law immunities, advocates for immunity doctrine still must show why the Derogation Canon should be applied in such a novel way as to incorporate common law defenses into Section 1983, given what any reasonable legislator would have understood about the canon in 1871. As discussed

270. I did not locate a single pre-1871 state or federal court decision involving common law torts in which Swift was raised. Even the post-1871 cases involving railroads were not uniform in their treatment of state tort law. Compare Baltimore & O. R.R. Co. v. Baugh, 149 U.S. 368, 379 (1893) (holding that tort liability rules for railroads are general law because they concern commerce); with Bucher v. Cheshire R.R. Co., 125 U.S. 555, 584 (1888) (considering Massachusetts law regarding tort liability rule “local” law even though case involved injuries while on railroad).

271. Hartford Fire Ins. Co. v. Chicago, Milwaukee, & St. Paul Ry. Co., 175 U.S. 91, 100 (1899). See also Smith v. Alabama, 124 U.S. 465, 475–76 (1888) (“It has never been doubted but that this entire body and system of law, regulating in general the relative rights and duties of persons within the territorial jurisdiction of the state, without regard to their pursuits, is subject to change at the will of the legislature of each state, except as that will may be restrained by the constitution of the United States.”); id. at 478 (noting that Swift applied to the field of “law-merchant” relations, “by reason of its international character”); Old Colony Tr. Co. v. City of Tacoma, 230 F. 389, 392 (9th Cir. 1916) (application of “principles of law to local conditions” is controlling even if state court is not construing a state statute); Blaylock v. Inc. Town of Muskogee, 117 F. 125, 126 (8th Cir. 1902) (federal courts follow state court decisions involving “powers and liabilities of the political or municipal corporations” in cases that do not involve federal law or “general or commercial law”).

272. See, e.g., City of Detroit v. Osborne, 135 U.S. 492, 498 (1890) (liability of city for defective sidewalks was matter of “local” law). See also Brush v. Comm’r, 300 U.S. 352, 364 (1937), overruled in part on other grounds by Graves v. People of State of New York ex rel. O’Keefe, 306 U.S. 466 (1939) (“The rule in respect of municipal liability in tort is a local matter; and whether it shall be strict or liberal or denied altogether is for the state which created the municipality alone to decide.”); United States v. City of New York, 82 F.2d 242, 243 (2d Cir. 1936) (holding that federal courts follow local law for purposes of municipal liability for torts of employees, except when displaced by federal statute); City of Denver v. Porter, 126 F. 288, 294 (8th Cir. 1903) (liability of municipalities for negligence is matter of local law); Powers v. Mass. Homoeopathic Hosp., 109 F. 294, 296–97 (1st Cir. 1901) (same).

273. Matasar, supra note 3, at 767 (arguing that Reconstruction Congress understood governing interpretative methodologies).
above, by 1871 the Derogation Canon was on insecure footing and had never been relied upon as a basis for incorporating a common law defense into a statutory cause of action.\textsuperscript{274} Nor does post-Reconstruction jurisprudence regarding the Derogation Canon rehabilitate the Court’s Section 1983 immunity doctrine.\textsuperscript{275}

To be clear, these insights have implications beyond qualified immunity. The availability of legislative, prosecutorial, and judicial immunity in Section 1983 litigation all are grounded in a flawed application of an already unsound Derogation Canon. To be sure, these implications are uncertain, because there may be independent grounds for retaining certain immunities. After all, Congress has arguably endorsed judicial immunity through its amendments to Section 1983,\textsuperscript{276} and legislative immunity is based on more than simply common law principles.\textsuperscript{277}

Prosecutorial immunity, however, has some of the same failings as qualified immunity doctrine—it is premised on common law doctrine, principally state law, which has no place in Section 1983.\textsuperscript{278}

A second implication is that because this Article’s interpretation of Section 1983 rests on the Civil Rights Act’s enacted text and existing modes of interpretation, effectuating it does not require any action by Congress. Some might object that the current Court would be resistant to reversing longstanding precedent, especially in light of so-called super stare decisis of statutory interpretation.\textsuperscript{279} But the Court’s misstep here is that it has entirely failed to grapple with the Civil Rights Act’s enacted text.

Moreover, notwithstanding the rhetoric that stare decisis is amplified in the area of statutory interpretation, the Court has often disregarded the presumption against overruling, albeit with varying degrees of transparency. By one count, the Court overruled statutory interpretation cases eighty times in a span of under

\begin{itemize}
\item \textsuperscript{274} See Part I.A & B.
\item \textsuperscript{275} See Part I.C.
\item \textsuperscript{276} By creating an exception concerning injunctive relief sought against judicial officers and also making clear that judicial officers shall not be liable for costs or attorneys’ fees except where the officer acted “in excess of such officer’s jurisdiction,” see Federal Courts Improvement Act of 1996, Pub. L. No. 104–317, 110 Stat. 3847 (codified as amended at 42 U.S.C. §§ 1983, 1988), Congress arguably codified judicial immunity. Moreover, the prescription against holding judges civilly liable for “judicial acts existing when there is jurisdiction of the subject-matter” was long recognized, including in a Supreme Court decision issued the same year that section 1983 was enacted (although not, to be clear, in the Section 1983 context). Bradley v. Fisher, 80 U.S. 335, 354 (1871). This immunity could only be overcome through impeachment proceedings “or in such other form as may be specially prescribed.” Id.
\item \textsuperscript{277} See Tenney v. Brandhove, 341 U.S. 367, 372–76 (1951) (describing basis for legislative immunity).
\item \textsuperscript{278} See Imbler v. Pachtman, 424 U.S. 409, 421–22 & n.19 (1976) (canvassing state court decisions to conclude that the majority of state courts found absolute immunity for prosecutors appropriate).
\item \textsuperscript{279} See William N. Eskridge, Jr., Overruling Statutory Precedents, 76 Geo. L.J. 1361, 1362 (1988) (describing the Supreme Court’s practice as applying “super-strong presumption of correctness” to statutory precedents).
\end{itemize}
The Court overruled Swift v. Tyson nearly one hundred years after it was decided, notwithstanding congressional silence in the interim. Monroe v. Pape was overruled in part seventeen years after it was decided, over the dissenters’ criticism that Congress had taken no action calling Monroe into question. Pierson’s error is at least as egregious as Swift’s or Monroe’s, and it has spawned an immunity doctrine that has created significant instability and garnered well-founded criticism.

Third, there are significant practical implications that flow from the arguments presented in this Article. When qualified immunity applies in litigation, it bars all compensation for victims of unconstitutional conduct, no matter how egregious or injurious. These cases run the gamut, from school officials who receive qualified immunity for subjecting teenage girls to invasive strip searches with no reasonable basis, to police officers who receive immunity when they use deadly force against unarmed citizens, to corrections officers who are aware that an incarcerated person is suicidal and watch without intervening as he wraps a phone cord around his neck and dies by suicide. Qualified immunity also has a harmful systemic impact because courts are free to apply the doctrine without ever considering the underlying merits of a plaintiff’s legal claim, making it difficult for constitutional law to change over time. And because it looms over every potential civil rights case, there is good reason to think that the doctrine deters injured people from initiating litigation, or interferes with their attempts to obtain representation. Removing qualified immunity would thus result in more compensation for constitutional misconduct, more development of constitutional law, and likely more civil rights litigation overall.

Not everyone would view these as positive developments. Talk of “floodgates” and other adverse consequences run throughout debates about civil litigation in this country. Although many of these concerns lack empirical foundation, it would be fair to presume that removing a defense, even one that does work in a small minority of cases, will result in greater litigation and

---

280. Id. at 1363 (identifying cases between 1961 and 1988 in which Court “overruled or materially modified statutory precedents”).
283. Supra notes 80–86 and accompanying text.
287. Supra notes 76–79 and accompanying text.
larger recoveries for plaintiffs. Whether this is a feature or a bug depends on normative judgments about the role of litigation in fostering law-abiding behavior, the other barriers that exist to prevent litigation abuse, the actual costs imposed by changing course, and the costs of maintaining the status quo. There are good reasons, however, to think that eliminating qualified immunity will reduce inequity and improve the administration of justice.291 And, as this Article has shown, eliminating qualified immunity would be consistent with the actual text enacted by the Reconstruction Congress.

CONCLUSION

This Article raises a legal version of a popular philosophical question about a tree falling in a forest.292 If a legislature enacts a statute, but no one bothers to read it, does it still have interpretive force? Section 1983’s immunity jurisprudence can only survive if the answer to this question is “no.” But for the reasons outlined in this Article, Section 1983 should be read and applied in light of its original, enacted text. The Reconstruction Congress intended to create liability notwithstanding contrary state law, meaning that state law immunities have no place in Section 1983. And the Derogation Canon, to the extent it applies at all to the Civil Rights Act of 1871, cannot be the basis for applying some other “common law” defense of qualified immunity.

If the Supreme Court continues to apply its qualified immunity doctrine to Section 1983 claims, its mistakes go beyond the well-grounded criticisms others have raised. For as this Article shows, the Court’s immunity jurisprudence has not just used “free-wheeling” judge-made law to fill a gap left by the legislature.293 Instead, it has deployed a canon of statutory interpretation, founded in a mistrust of legislatures in favor of supposedly greater judicial wisdom, to apply Section 1983 in a way that contradicts text adopted by the Reconstruction Congress. Compounding one grave error with another, the Supreme Court has created an immunity jurisprudence that departs from text, purpose, and context.

292. See 3 CHAUTAUQUAN 543–44 (June 1883) (posing question “[i]f a tree were to fall on an island where there were no human beings would there be any sound?”).
293. Supra note 93.